WORLD CONFERENCE: Police separate Israeli and Palestinian supporters as they clash verbally outside the World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) in Durban last week. The World Conference Against Racism started last Friday, despite the absence of the United States which stayed away in protest against proposals equating Zionism with racism, and the issue of reparations for slavery. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Anti-Jewish hostility at Durban conference

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An "oppressive, anti-Semitic" atmosphere, including propaganda reminiscent of Nazi-era Germany, greeted Jewish delegates to the United Nations-sponsored World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) taking place this week in Durban, South Africa.

Delegates were prepared for hostility toward Israel and even language appropriating Holocaust imagery to describe treatment of Palestinians, but the blatancy of the anti-Jewish and anti-Israel bombast caught many off guard.

A weary-sounding Keith Landy, president of Canadian Jewish Congress, told The CJN in a telephone interview that a pre-conference forum of thousands of representatives from Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) left him feeling vulnerable and threatened "in a way I haven't felt before."

Posters, banners, books, pamphlets and even T-shirts slamming Jews and depicting Israel as an apartheid state were prominently displayed all over the conference site, Landy said, leading delegates to fear that the atmosphere would result in a week of Israel-bashing and a final declaration that could be extremely critical of the Jewish State.

But contrary to local media reports, Landy said he had no plans to quit the conference, as he had been scheduled to leave Durban last Saturday anyway for a Canada-Israel Committee meeting in Israel.

"It's not all that relevant whether NGOs leave," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations, who is also in Durban.

Arafat will never make peace: Olmert

BY MORDECHAI BEN-DAT
Editor

JERUSALEM — There will be no peace with the Palestinians as long as Yasser Arafat is their leader, Jerusalem's mayor, Ehud Olmert, said last week in an exclusive, wide-ranging interview with The CJN.

"Arafat will never sign an agreement," Olmert said. "Arafat will never want to be the one who puts the stamp of kashrut to the existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East and ends the conflict between us and the Palestinians. As long as he is in power, there is no chance for any dramatic change."

Ehud Olmert

Olmert spoke to The CJN in his office at Safra Square in downtown Jerusalem, merely hours after he had visited the south Jerusalem neighbourhood of Gilo late Tuesday night.

For the second consecutive night, from the neighbouring village of Beit Jalla, this time from a redoubt near the village's Lutheran church,

CANADA

Aided in Search

MONTREAL — Dozens of Orthodox Jews from Montreal joined in last week's search for a New York hiker who went missing in the woods near Franconia, N.H. The body of Abraham Hauer, 53, of Brooklyn, was found Aug. 28 after his wife reported that he had not returned from a short hike. Hundreds of Orthodox Jews from Montreal, New York and New Jersey aided in the two-day search, along with Fish and Game officials, the National Guard and local volunteers. Hauer was well known as the manager of a synagogue in Bethlehem, a small town in northern New Hampshire that was a popular summer retreat for Orthodox Jews from the area.

ISRAEL

Rape Cover-Up

JERUSALEM — The director of an immigrant absorption centre in central Israel has been dismissed for trying to cover up the rape of a 12-year-old Ethiopian girl at the facility. The Israeli daily Ha'aretz reported that the official had reprimanded a social worker for telling police about the case, which occurred nine months ago and resulted in the girl becoming pregnant.

Monument Defaced

STOCKHOLM — A monument to Swedish World War II hero Raoul Wallenberg here was defaced with spray paint last week. The incident took place less than 24 hours after the memorial was inaugurated by Sweden's king and foreign dignitaries.

Austrian Visit

VIENNA — Austrian Vice-Chancellor Susanne Riess-Passer is planning to visit Israel in October in an attempt to improve relations between the two countries. Israel withdrew its ambassador from Vienna in February 2000 and has said it will not send a new one while Riess-Passer's far-right Freedom Party remains in the government.

Bombing Update

BUENOS AIRES — Argentina plans to prosecute Iran and Hezbollah for alleged involvement in the 1994 car bombing of the Jewish community centre here. The move likely will come at the end of September, when a trial of Argentines with suspected links to the bombing is slated to start.

Rio Rabbi Beaten, Robbed

RIO DE JANEIRO — A well-known rabbi here was beaten by gang members inside a synagogue, where the rabbi's family also resides.

Rabbi Jacob Israel Blumenfeld said the three men who invaded his home in the Copacabana section of Rio de Janeiro last Sunday morning likely followed him after he withdrew $100 from an automatic teller machine.

After tying Rabbi Blumenfeld up and beating him, gang members forced his mother to open a safe on the second floor of the residence. The trio got away with $1,000 and antique jewelry.

"I was calm. I asked the whole time for God to keep me alive," he said of his ordeal.

The 45-year-old rabbi was treated at a local hospital and released. His mother was not injured.

Before leaving, the robbers damaged the Torah scroll and scrawled gang signs on the synagogue walls.

One gang member was heard to remark while looting the home that Jews "must have much more" money than others.

Alleged terrorist worked in Jewish centre

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — An Egyptian refugee claimant arrested three weeks ago as a terrorist suspect worked for a short time as a cleaner in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC), but a community spokesperson says his employment there was no more than a coincidence.

Mahmoud Jaballah was not employed by the BJCC, but was a member of a cleaning crew assigned to the BJCC by a company that had obtained the cleaning contract, said Bernie Farber, executive director of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region.

Speaking on security matters on behalf of the BJCC, Farber said, "There is nothing to suggest he tried to get work at the BJCC."

Government documents filed recently in Federal Court allege Jaballah is a member of Al Jihad, a radical Islamic group that originated in Egypt, and that he might engage in terrorist acts.

Jaballah worked at the BJCC until BJCC personnel, informed by the RCMP they were investigating Jaballah, asked the company to re-assign him elsewhere, Farber said.

"There is absolutely nothing to lead us or the RCMP to believe his cleaning had anything to do with the Jewish community," Farber said.

Reassessment of communal security needs

In the three years since Jaballah worked at the centre, "steps have been taken so that this sort of thing is not repeated. In the last three years, there has been a reassessment of Jewish communal security needs, and this issue is moot. There is now a way to deal with it."

The Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) alleges Al Jihad, a radical offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood, is allied with Osama Bin Laden's Al Qaida organization and took credit for the American Embassy bombings in Kenya and Tanzania. More than 200 people were killed in those attacks.

Jaballah, who teaches in a Muslim school, has already been before the courts. In 1999, government authorities arrested Jaballah under a security certificate, alleging he was associated with terrorist groups. But Federal Court Judge Bud Cullen rejected the government case, ruling Jaballah's denials were plausible. Subsequent investigation by CSIS reportedly led to further evidence against Jaballah, leading to the recent arrest.

Jaballah's lawyer, Rocco Galati, denounced the case against his client, saying authorities have produced no evidence of wrongdoing.

"Obviously there is nothing against my client. If there was, Egypt or the United States would have sought his extradition."

Galati said Jaballah's employment as a cleaner was fully canvassed in his 1999 hearing. "There was never any evidence that he posed a threat to the community," he said.

Galati slammed the highly secretive legal process employed in security cases, saying that even as Jaballah's lawyer he has not seen nor will he be shown the evidence that allegedly implicates his client. There is no way for a defence lawyer in such a case to test the evidence against his client, he said.

Canadian intelligence agencies argue they cannot reveal all the evidence they possess. Some is provided by foreign intelligence agencies who demand secrecy, while ensuring safety for informants is another priority.

Galati suggested the evidence in the 1999 case against Jaballah was weak, since to uphold the government case, the judge would only have had to find reasonable grounds that Jaballah may have been a member of a terrorist group.

The recent government statement filed in Federal Court, which summarizes its information about Jaballah, states that

Contradictions and paradoxes in Israel

From the editor's desk

Sometimes the contradictions and paradoxes of life will knock you down or lift you up. Israel, where these words are being written, is a land with so many contradictions and paradoxes – geographical, political, religious, demographic, to name but an obvious few – a visitor's feelings constantly swirl, alternately poking one in the emotional solar plexus or launching the spirit to soar on high. One is therefore in constant physical and emotional flux between exhaustion and exhilaration, and grateful for it.

The security is worrisome and vexing. Every day, gunmen are let loose by the Palestinian leadership to shoot at Jews travelling to their homes in the West Bank. Jews are frequently murdered by these roadside thugs. Travel in the territories is tense and even harrowing. And as we know all too sadly, there have been too many instances when the murderers have penetrated into the cities as well. The people here are wary, some even gloomy, but not morbid.

Despite the wariness and the gloomy mood, the hustle and the bustle of life on the city streets have not abated. The traffic on the roads still frustrates, even as the "traffic" on the sidewalks still entertains. There are indeed visibly few tourists. But there are also indeed many Israelis going about their daily routines: buying, selling, shouting, whispering, rushing, dawdling, window-shopping, snacking. A visitor cannot help but be impressed and even inspired by the "normality" of life here, given that life in Israel is never "normal" in the usual sense, in these clearly abnormal times.

The roads in and out of Jerusalem are literally choked with the colourful yet unpleasant ribbon of car-upon-car-upon-car of irritating traffic. Yet outside the sparkling dolomite city, merely moments away by car, a visitor can find countless idyllic, verdantly green, splendidly aromatic, quieter, reflective spaces. One such space, a mere 15 minutes along the cluttered roads outside the capital is "Bustan" Abu Gosh, the forest grove of Abu Gosh.

Abu Gosh is a mostly Christian Arab village that nestles like a young dove in the cradle of a green bough, in the hills west of Jerusalem. Last week, this visitor attended the wedding of a young Jewish couple there.

The paradox between the chatter of the city and the song of the bustan was breathtaking and deeply moving. Moreover, there, under the elegant bower of the chupah and later amid the happy celebration of the wedding feast, was proof of the miracle of Jewish history that, every now and then, stares at us from outside the corners of our daily anxieties and fears.

The bride, so lovely and laughing, was a child of Canada; the groom, so aware and anticipating, was a child of the United States.

Alongside this wedding guest at the dinner table were guests from Moscow, Mexico, Venezuela, New York and Israel. And of course, there were hundreds of other guests from around the globe at this wedding.

Jerusalem brought us all together. There we sat, there we danced, there we all attempted to bring happiness to the young bride and groom at the start of their newly married lives.

The poignancy of the evening could not be overlooked. As we chanted with full heart the verses of the sixth blessing of the seven special blessings at a Jewish marriage, that "the voices of joy and the voices of happiness should soon be heard in the environs of Jerusalem...", the awareness was inescapable that it was actually, literally happening. And that we were part of it. Ours were the voices of joy and the voices of happiness in "Bustan" Abu Gosh, just outside Jerusalem. It was a remarkable feeling.

The strife of Israel's current "situation" and the sheer inspiration of the wedding celebration was a paradox too startling and too humbling to ignore.

Israel is far more than the images we see in the newscasts of CNN and ABC. A short five-day visit confirms that. It would be false to gainsay the edginess and nervousness of everyday life in Israel. But from the vantage of our own lives, distant by space, how removed we become from its fullness and richness too. To deny that would be no less a falsehood.

The contradictions and paradoxes are so many in Israel. After five short days, this visitor was exhausted, but exhilarated, too.

UJA Campaign 2002 addresses cutbacks

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — These are not normal times, the director general of Keren Hayesod – United Israel Appeal told canvassers for UJA Federation's Campaign 2002 last week.

Israel is fighting a complicated and confusing war, said Gad Ben-Ari, speaking to a crowd of 250 volunteers at the Inn on the Park hotel.

Although the war has no name, said Ben-Ari, "let us make no mistake about this – it is a war, because every day both civilians and soldiers are being killed."

'A complicated and confusing war'

Now civilians, rather than soldiers, are on the front lines, he said. The only way for them to deal with the situation, he added, is by denial, "because you cannot understand and absorb everything... No Israeli can feel safe from the threat of terror."

There is no military solution, Ben-Ari stated. In fact, he noted, Israel is "making tremendous efforts not to win this war, because the meaning of a military victory is to go back to the territories, to occupy Gaza and Nablus and Jericho – something which could be catastrophic for Israel."

Ben-Ari stressed that Israel will remain strong.

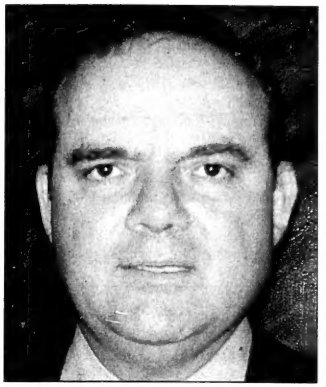
But the economic impact of the ongoing conflict has amounted to billions of shekels, he said. Aside from government cutbacks affecting social services, the impact is felt, among other sectors, in the tourism industry, now running at less than 25 percent of last year's level, with most of that income from Israeli tourists, he added, noting that in the past year, 27 major hotels closed down and dozens of others are on the verge of closing or bankruptcy.

Other affected industries include construction and agriculture. Foreign investment went down 80 percent in 2000/2001, while the population of Israel expanded by two percent, Ben-Ari said.

This summer, the Israeli government decided on across-the-board budget cuts of about $4 billion shekels to all government ministries, to be used instead for security. Education, health, absorption and immigration are all affected, he explained.

Two weeks ago, Ben-Ari noted, Israel's health minister asked the public not to go to government hospitals, because their stock of drugs was low and there was no budget to replenish. "That's just one example of a very tight situation."

This year's Toronto campaign, which was launched officially on Aug. 22 and will pick up steam with a telephone canvassing blitz beginning Sunday, Sept. 9 (Super Sunday), has been refocused to address the government cuts and a concurrent, unusual, request by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon for Diaspora Jewry to share Israel's financial burden.



Gad Ben-Ari

In Toronto, a new "challenge fund" has been established by individual families to match every donation increase over last year. The fund has accumulated more than $3 million, said Michael Bregman, who along with David Koschitzky is this year's campaign co-chair.

The campaign has already received pledges totalling more than $11 million, said Bregman.

"What's more incredible than the amount," he noted, "is that it represents an increase on average of 35 percent." The campaign goal is now $50 million, an increase of $7 million over the amount raised last year.

Based on his experience from 1992 to 1994 as media adviser and spokesperson for the late Yitzhak Rabin, Ben-Ari said Israeli prime ministers face "impossible dilemmas" in the struggle against terror.

"How to strike against the infrastructures of the terrorist organizations and at the same time not to harm innocent civilians" is one issue. How to conduct a war with an enemy who will eventually be your negotiating partner is another.

"That means how not to crush the enemy."

This particular war, he mentioned, is also a war of propaganda, being fought on television screens and in newspapers.

Israel has a clear conscience and [clean] hands, said Ben-Ari. "This was a war imposed on us after we offered far-reaching concessions... We were willing to go as far as offering to divide Jerusalem, but we were rejected by an eruption of violence and bloodshed."

Now the violence is escalating, Ben-Ari said. "We are in for the long haul. We have to prepare for months, maybe years of violence, and like a long-distance runner, we in Israel and the Jewish world have to be prepared for a long struggle."

Koschitzky wants to raise profile of Bar-Ilan

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Mira Koschitzky agreed to become national president of Canadian Friends of Bar-Ilan University in June because she likes what the university stands for.

"Its mission," she explained in an interview at her home last week, "is to unite Israelis – the religious and secular." That goal is particularly important now, given the difficult times Israel is going through, Koschitzky said.

Bar-Ilan's commitment to imparting Jewish knowledge to its student body of 30,000 – split approximately half-and-half between observant and secular students – also appeals to her, she said. Bar-Ilan is also involved in a project that teaches high school students about their Jewish heritage.

"Bar-Ilan is interested in the Jewishness of Israel, and I like that."

But the Ramat Gan university, with five campuses, also offers a range of secular programs, Koschitzky added, citing its work in archeology, music, brain cell research, and study of the Land of Israel, to name a few. It is also opening an engineering school this fall.

Koschitzky and her husband Saul have a longstanding involvement with Bar-Ilan, among other institutions and organizations they support. A past national executive chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Mira's Bar-Ilan activities include membership on its national board of directors and Toronto chapter leadership committee. She also holds a seat on the international board of trustees, the university's governing body.

In 1997, she received an honorary doctorate from Bar-Ilan for community leadership and commitment to religious Zionist education, and dedicated the university's Land of Israel Studies Department in memory of her parents, Vilma and Frank Martin (Szusz).

A native of Bratislava, Czechoslovakia who immigrated here in 1948 at the age of 12, Koschitzky is the mother of three and grandmother of 11.

Mira Koschitzky

In her student days, she spent a year at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem before completing her BA in political science and economics at the University of Toronto.

These days, when Koschitzky is working on behalf of Bar-Ilan, she's likely to be found at the corner desk in her home library, a comfortable, modern room filled with books and family photos.

The Canadian Friends group has chapters in Toronto and Montreal, and supporters in a number of other cities, where Koschitzky hopes to encourage more active involvement.

The Toronto chapter also has a new president, Henry Wigoda.

Local leadership, like the student body in Israel, is a mix of Orthodox and non-Orthodox, Koschitzky said. "I think that's very important."

Wigoda has "brought in interesting new lay people, and they're planning interesting things," said Koschitzky. Bar-Ilan president Moshe Kaveh will be here in October to meet with lay leaders, she said. "We're very excited about that."

Kaveh recently embarked on a five-year plan, working toward Bar-Ilan's 50th anniversary in 2005, to raise $200 million (US) for academic development and construction of buildings.

Among Koschitzky's goals is furthering the five-year project and raising the profile of the university in Canada. "We have students from Canada at Bar-Ilan on scholarships. This is something I would also like to further."

On Super Sunday September 9th, a UJA volunteer will be calling on you to help. The Challenge Fund will help your gift go even farther.

From September 9-13, one of several thousand UJA Federation volunteers, mobilized for this urgent campaign, will be contacting you to answer Israel's request for assistance during these troubled days. Your increased gift will provide programs for those hardest hit by the Israeli government's transfer of funds from vital services to increased security costs. This year, there's also a way for your gift to go even farther, through the new Challenge Fund.

The generous families who created the Challenge Fund have stepped forward to match every gift increase over last year, dollar for dollar. That way your additional UJA Federation donation will double on Israel's behalf. So please consider what Israel is going through and respond positively when contacted next week.

Israel is calling. It's time to answer.

Singling out Israel

The United Nation's Conference Against Racism, which began last week in Durban, South Africa, is theoretically a noble and praiseworthy event. Racial discrimination is and has been a problem of horrific and tragic dimensions, and people of goodwill should work tirelessly to eliminate it as a destructive force.

But judging by a draft text being foisted upon the conference at the insistence of Islamic and Arab countries, Israel may yet be singled out as the world's sole practitioner of racism, and Zionism may be equated with racism. If these ugly, politically-inspired resolutions are officially adopted, the scourge of anti-Semitism – a particularly vile form of racism that has claimed the lives of millions of Jews throughout the ages – will be exacerbated, and the legitimacy of Israel's rightful existence will be unjustly questioned. Is this what the organizers of the conference originally had in mind? We doubt it. Is the UN prepared to bring disrepute upon itself for the sake of kowtowing to narrow, self-serving agendas? We hope not. The conference should not be hijacked.

Lest it be forgotten, we live in an imperfect world where racism is more often the norm than the exception. Why, then, single out Israel, the only genuine democracy in the Middle East, and condemn Zionism, which, in part, was a reaction to European anti-Semitism? If fairness and decency are to prevail, the conference should examine such forms of prejudice as racist practices in Arab nations, anti-Semitic books in Palestinian and Syrian schools and neo-Nazi movements in North America and Europe. The list, unfortunately, goes on and on. But in Durban, only Israel may be vilfied. It is outrageous and unfair.

Vatican stonewalling

The Vatican should reflect on its arbitrary and unreasonable decision to shut down an international historians' commission, which had been assiduously investigating its policies and conduct before and during the Holocaust.

By denying these scholars access to unpublished Vatican documents from the period of 1923 onwards, ostensibly for technical reasons," the Roman Catholic Church has created the all-too-palpable impression that it has something to hide.

The panel, composed of distinguished Catholic and Jewish historians, was established in 1999 by the Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews – a Vatican body – and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations. Its sole, overriding purpose is to shed light on the truth. But what self-respecting, impartial historian can be expected to work under the insidious pall of censorship?

Unless the Vatican reverses its position and allows the historians unfettered access to the archives, the hard, unadorned facts may never be known. Surely the Vatican understands that its stonewalling is untenable and raises suspicions about its motives.

The "sainthood" of Edith Stein

Regarding your article on Edith Stein ("Controversial saint invoked in papal call for Mideast peace," CJN, Aug. 16), Stein (also known as Ste. Teresa Benedetta) may have desired an even "deeper spiritual link" to the Holy Land than the Pope alluded to.

In the first half of 1942, she "applied" to her ecclesiastical superiors for a "transfer" to the Carmelite nunnery on the slopes of Mount Carmel, Haifa. Shortly afterward, she was "referred" to the Gestapo by one of her colleagues at the religious institution where she lived. He was a priest – who also happened to be an enthusiastic Nazi party member. What did she intend to do if she ever got to Haifa... "deconvert?"

This is indeed a matter which bears much further investigation by those who have access to the relevant archives.

Researching Shavl

I am doing research for a biographical book tentatively entitled Shavl about a family who originated from the town of Shavl, now Siauliai, in Lithuania. The family survived the Holocaust thanks to their own resourcefulness and the support of a group of non-Jews, who aided them in their escape and ultimate migration to Canada.

As part of my preparation, I'm seeking other survivors from Shavl who would be prepared to talk to me about their experiences prior to, during and after the war.

Another blow to world Jewry

I can't stop staring at the face of the wounded Israeli child hanging lifeless in a man's arms as he carries her away from the Jerusalem bombing. I feel engulfed by such deep sorrow. I read about a family torn in half, parents and children ripped apart by nails and glass, while their other children, wounded and grief-stricken, attend the funeral. I feel a sickening ache in the pit of my stomach.

Later, as I sit in shul, I listen to others talk about the tragedy – "One or two more bombs and Israelis are going to leave the country," "There's nothing to do but to pray," "At least we're safe here," "It's too dangerous to go to Israel now."

Anger wells up inside of me. I'm enraged. How can they say there's nothing we can do? That we dare not go there? Israelis fight, not just for the survival of Israel, but for me, for us. Innocent Israeli children are being murdered because they and their families maintain the State that fosters and enhances our Jewish freedom in the world.

I'm compelled to ask myself: they do their part, should I not do mine? Is the danger in going there for a week, more significant than the danger they face everyday? Is my life more important than theirs? Is the horrifying hatred directed toward them or toward all Jews, including me? What would happen, God forbid, if Israel was destroyed? Does the world care about us any more now than they did then?

There is only one answer. We're not separate from Israel and Israel is not separate from us. We're in it together and no denial, no degree of apathy, can protect us. There's nowhere to hide from truth.

I'm going to be counted at the Sept. 23 international solidarity rally for Israel. I'm going to take a stand. I hope you do, too.

Sarner's comments anti-Orthodox

It seems your columnist Robert Sarner generally likes to make gratuitous comments about Orthodox Jews in his otherwise folksy accounts of life in Israel.

His latest column, "Trying to make sense of Israeli life" (CJN, Aug. 9), however, not only displayed the usual vitriol but was also not factual.

As Israeli law now stands, any Jewish man, haredi or not, can avail himself of a draft exemption as long as he is learning full time in a recognized yeshiva. That is not the same as "draft dodging," which is, of course, illegal.

For the record, haredi men who do not learn full time must serve and do serve, as we saw in a recent photograph in The CJN itself.

Sarner obviously does not share the religious presuppositions that would allow him to consider a committment to Torah learning as an important national service. But one would expect a Jewish journalist to be able to transcend the differences between Jews enough to refrain from making intemperate and inaccurate accusations.

Sarner misunderstands issue

It is disturbing that Robert Sarner ("Trying to make sense of Israeli life," CJN, Aug. 9) wonders why haredi men in Israel do not serve in the IDF, and that he expresses incredulity at the fact that they don't even contribute to the welfare of the State in non-military activities, as do unmarried haredi women.

In fact, Sarner entirely misunderstands the whole issue of haredi army deferments. It is not cowardice, laziness or apathy that keeps Israeli haredim out of the army. Rather, it comes from the understanding of the Torah leadership in Israel's early days that Torah study, as much as soldiers and weapons, is a necessary component in the defence and protection of a Jewish State. These leaders persuaded David Ben- Gurion to legally exempt full-time Torah scholars from the IDF, in the conscientious belief that without the merit of Torah study, the nascent state would be doomed.

Sarner may not share the religious mindset of the haredi leadership, but as a fair-minded person, he should acknowledge the sincerity of their position. It goes without saying that young haredi men who do not study Torah diligently should be serving in the IDF. If not, they are shirking their responsibility to defend the nation.

Perspectives

'The synagogue is Orthodox, the rabbis are Conservative and the people are Reform'

By MYRIAM SHECHTER
Special to The CJN

There is a place where the most treasured piece of art is the statue of a young Jewish king. It is so treasured that there are a number of copies indistinguishable from the original, copies which are exhibited in all major public areas of this place, while the original piece of art is well protected in a specially built area of a museum. There are also many cheap copies of the statue of the young Jewish king, in all sizes and materials, that tourists buy by the thousands. The young Jewish king is David, and the place is the amazing, gorgeous city of art, Florence.

The city unfolds like an open air architectural museum. Familiar from paintings and movies, the Florence skyline is instantly recognizable, with the immense cupola of the Duomo and the high medieval Signoria tower.

Since 1882, a new shape has been added to the famed medieval silhouette: the green cupola of the Great Temple. A veritable landmark in this city already chock full of architectural landmarks, this imposing structure was called the "emancipation synagogue," as it was designed and built on purpose, rather than adapting an existing ghetto building. With its exquisite Moorish architectural style, it adds an exotic note to the trove of Florentine treasures and a home and point of convergence for the Jewish community of Florence.

The history of Florentine Jewry is framed both by the history of Florence and that of the Italian Jewry. Although there were some periods of persecution and violence, Italy was one of the few countries where Jews led a relatively tranquil life, thus allowing for cultural and economic development of many Jewish centres; these, in turn, contributed to the development of their adopted nation.

Jews started arriving in Rome during the Maccabee period (2nd century BC), with a community firmly established by the 1st century BC. After the destruction of the Temple, more Jews joined the "sinagogai," as the Romans called these small communities which started forming all over the land. Often confused with the early Christians, the ranks of about 30,000 Jews were expanded through conversions of Romans attracted by Jewish customs.

The acceptance of Christianity brought along restrictions on Jewish liberty, especially after the Empire was divided in two and the reign of Byzantium extended over part of Italy. However, over time, a number of communities flourished, such as Rome, Bari, Otranto and Sicily, and learned Italian Jews – among them Joseph ben Gurion of Josippon fame – made names for themselves in Europe.

Although still subject to restrictions and occasional indignities, all in all, the Italian Jews managed to lead fairly normal lives, often consulted by nobles and sovereigns, and respected for their learning and powers of achievement.

In 1215, Pope Innocent III sanctioned the laws which obliged Jews to live apart and to wear a distinctive sign: a pointed hat or a yellow circle on their left shoulder.

The Jewish population grew considerably in the 14th century following immigrations from France and Germany. The year 1492 brought the expulsion of the Spanish Jews, many of whom found refuge in Italy, as well as a renewed revival of religious fanaticism which provoked a wave of hatred against them.

More and more, the Jewish communities segregated themselves, both from necessity and as means of self-defence. For about three centuries, Jewish life retreated into ghettos, starting with the most famous of all, the Venetian ghetto, established in 1516 on the site of a foundry. "Getto," in the Venetian dialect, means "foundry;" altered by the rough German pronunciation, the soft "g" was changed into a hard one, generating the word "ghetto," a name which eventually extended to other cities.

Each Italian ghetto had its own synagogues, also called "scole," which appealed to worshippers who followed three major rites, still in use today: the Italian rite, practiced by the first Jews who came to Rome; the Spanish or Sephardi rite, brought in from Spain and Portugal following the 1492 expulsion; and the German or Ashkenazi rite of the Jews who came from Central Europe.

There was a fourth rite as well, a French rite called "Matan," prevalent mostly in the northern area of Piedmont. This rite is not practised any more today.

The ghettos were abolished during the 18th and 19th centuries, with the last ghetto gates broken down in 1870 in Rome.

The history of the Italian Jews is not complete without the tragic chapter of the Holocaust. Throughout Italy, monuments and plaques remind locals and visitors of the thousands that perished at the hand of the Nazis.

I am standing in front of Florence's Great Temple, facing a huge commemorative plaque: column upon column, names of men, women, children and whole families. There is a special column for those that were shot, fucilati, and another for the people that lost their lives fighting as partisans, partigiani caduti.

The sun is shining; it is quiet and peaceful. Flowers brighten the gracious front yard separated from the street by an imposing fier forgé grillage. I am thinking of all the terrible times that Jewish people went through, century upon century. But certainly, things are different now, aren't they?

However, I notice that the entrance to the synagogue complex – which includes a museum, classrooms for the children and administration offices – is through a small door controlled by a security device. What is the danger, I inquire? Apparently, the Florence synagogue is on a list of terrorist targets. Things are different, and things are the same.

Throughout their common history, the Florentine Jews and the city of Florence have had a love-hate relationship. Although Jews probably lived in Florence since ancient Rome, they enter local history during the 15th century, when the powerful Medicis invited Jewish bankers to establish money- lending institutions.

In 1551, at the advice of Jacob Abravanel, a Sephardi Jew from Ferrara, Duke Cosimo I de Medici published a decree of privilege for "Greeks, Turks, Moors, Hebrews, Armenians and Persians," promising them rights and privileges. Many Spanish, Portuguese and Levantine Jews accepted the invitation, thus forming the first Sephardi group within the local Italian community. Like most of Italy, Florence now housed different rites: the Italian, the Sephardi and the Ashkenazi.

The "privileged" status of the Jews was remorselessly traded in by Cosimo I for the title of Grand Duke promised by Pope Pius V. In exchange for this coveted status, Cosimo established anti-Jewish regulations, revoking previous rights and imposing the wear of the badge, the yellow circle. In 1570, the Jews of Florence were confined to a newly formed ghetto (the current area of the Piazza della Repubblica), except for a few families who continued living in a narrow alley called de' Giudei near Cosimo's residence, the Palazzo Pitti, so he could call on them for his own needs.

This was a sad period in the history of the Florentine Jews, as internal hostility developed between the original Italian group and the more recent Spanish one. Unification was reached in the second half of the 17th century with the creation of the Universita of the Jews.

In 1848, the gates of the ghetto opened and the new city centre was built in its place. For tourists who are used to finding vestiges of old Jewish quarters in most European cities, Florence is a major deception. However, they are greatly compensated by visiting the Synagogue of Florence – the Great Temple – an exuberant symphony of colours, rich mosaics, lacy wood carvings, inlaid marble floors, colourful stained glass windows, graceful fer forgé candelabra, a warm tapestry of muted colours spread all over the walls, floors and domed ceilings.

Inspired by the Byzantine church of Hagia Sofia from Istanbul, and completed in 1882, the Moorish-looking synagogue was designed by three architects: Treves, Falcini and Micheli with funds bequested by David Levy, a former president of the community, who left his estate to build "a monumental temple worthy of Florence."

The construction of a new synagogue had become a necessity after the destruction of the Florentine ghetto, as it served as a much-needed symbol of the rebirth of a free and energetic community. After eight years of hard work by expert masons and artisans, the synagogue, located on Via Farini 4, was solemnly inaugurated under the then- chief rabbi David Jacob Maroni.

Damaged by Germans in 1944, and again by a major flood in 1966, the synagogue was restored and brought back to its original splendour. A modern old people's home was built just behind it in 1959, and a school building was dedicated to the memory of Holocaust victim Rabbi Nathan Cassuto in 1964.

Since 1981, the second floor of the synagogue has housed the Jewish Museum of Florence, which allows visitors to follow the history of the Florentine community and to admire a large variety of objects of worship.

A couple of smaller places of worship had remained active in a building in Via delle Oche for a period of time: one of Italian rite which ceased functioning before the war, and an Ashkenazi one used by a group of German Jews who had found refuge in Florence. When the property was sold, they were temporarily replaced with a small synagogue within the Jewish school. So today, the Great Temple of Florence is the only Jewish place of worship standing proudly among the city's myriad of cathedrals and churches.

I was curious as to how a single synagogue can cope with so many diverse rites and customs. I posed this question to Dora Liscia, the president of the community and director of the museum. She clarified my dilemma by quoting Rabbi Ricardo Disegni from Rome, who had explained to Americans the essence of the Italian community: "The synagogue is Orthodox, the rabbis are Conservative, and the people are Reform."

Actually, the synagogue in Florence practises the Sephardi rite, similar to Venice, Livorno and Ferrara, while in Rome, the Italian rite is still prevalent.

The community numbers about 1,000 people who "belong" officially, with about another 300, mostly American or Israeli, who join them for high holy days or special festivities.

The problem of the Florentine community, explains Liscia, is "that we are a small community... but we have the same services as a great community: rabbi, Chazzan, Maccabi, young people's group, Keren Kayemet, old people home... a big synagogue, too large for us, and we have to spend a lot of money to restore it."

A writer and a scholar, Liscia jokes that she saves the community money by cleaning the museum objects herself, thus adding "cleaning lady" to her long list of qualifications.

As I leave the synagogue, a group of Christian children file in with their teacher and a guide, ready to learn about the Jewish heritage in their city. Maybe things are going to be different. Maybe there is going to be understanding and respect between people of different faiths as these children grow up.

I decide to go back to visit the young Jewish king at the Accademia Museum and let him know that his descendants seem to be doing well in this amazing, gorgeous city.

A remarkable people search

I wonder how many of my readers have heard of Ve'ahavta, a Toronto organization whose subtitle is The Canadian Jewish Humanitarian Relief and Committee.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Ve'ahavta means "you shall love," and is taken from one of the Torah's most oft-quoted verses, "You shall love your neighbour as yourself."

The unique aspect of Ve'ahavta is that it takes this biblical command very seriously, and goes out in search of the neighbour who must be loved.

One summer night a few weeks ago, I was a guest of Ve'ahavta, which is chaired by Avrum Rosensweig, scion of a rabbinic family. Its relief effort is not confined to members of the Jewish community, but to any people in need of the most basic relief, which is to say, those with neither a place of their own to sleep nor sufficient food to eat.

For close to eight hours one night every week, staff members and volunteers associated with Ve'ahavta drive a van equipped with food and clothing and search Canada's largest metropolis for people living in the streets.

I had been invited to join the night expedition, and it became an experience that was both depressing and uplifting.

How did the driver and his associates find the homeless? I could not see them, but they, with eagle eyes and a knowledge of the places homeless people spend their nights, were able to find them by the dozen.

The van I was in has large letters painted on its side that proclaim "Street Help." The moment the potential clients see the van or are awakened from sleep by one of the staff, they come and gratefully accept what is being offered. Sandwiches and a cold drink were particularly popular, and of clothing items, socks were the number 1 request.

Lest my readers think that we went to those parts of town that might qualify as semi-slums, forget it. A significant number of those in need were sleeping in the open in Toronto's best neighbourhoods, like Forest Hill and Rosedale. Of course, we also found them all the way downtown in Tent City, on Cherry Street, in shacks that stand on soil, which, from time to time, the city has declared to be contaminated.

The people at Ve'ahavta make no moral decisions; they help their fellow human beings without regard to race, religion or national background.

Where do the materials come from that Ve'ahavta distributes? From donations from companies and individuals. If you would like more information or want to donate clothing or money, please call 416-964-7698.

It's time to go home

Jerusalem has seemed different to me lately. More distant than usual, more the focus of dire news reports than a daily reality. That's because I've been far removed from the capital since late June. Physically, that is.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

Contrary to what's inscribed on this page beneath my mug shot, this month's column does not come to you from the Middle East. Nor, for that matter, did the previous dispatch, despite appearances to the contrary. So much for full disclosure.

In a few days, my family and I will be leaving for Israel, and will be there by the time these words are in print. For now, I'm savouring the end of a two-month sojourn in Canada, well away from the line of fire.

Usually, after such a long trip abroad, I eagerly await getting home. This time, I'm returning to Israel with trepidation and a heavy heart as never before. Even in January 1991, when I flew back to Israel from Canada on the eve of the Gulf War, only a few days before the first Iraqi Scud missile attack, I was more at ease.

I don't like to acknowledge it, but Palestinian terrorists have scored at least one victory through their campaign of mass murder of Israelis. Not only have they caused wide-scale tragedy, battered the so-called peace process, undermined Israel's economy and disrupted daily life, they've also created a terrible psychosis of fear.

I admit it: I'm deeply concerned – should I say afraid – for the safety of my wife and children. Such fear is endemic now in Israel. It's disturbing, contagious and volatile. And with most people in such a state, daily life is robbed of much of its joy and spontaneity.

Such was not the case for us this summer. For the fifth year in a row, my wife and I were in Canada as part of an Israeli delegation brought over to work on staff at Camp Ramah in Ontario. For us, the main incentive was to provide our three children the chance to be campers in a setting and framework unthinkable in Israel.

Situated on a magnificent lake in the beautiful, bucolic region of Muskoka, Ramah is a paradise for the hundreds of Canadian and American campers it attracts every summer. For children and staffers from Israel it's a dream-like nirvana, now more than ever, given the current strife and tensions back home.

In Muskoka, in sharp contrast to what Israelis are used to, nature is the commanding force – not politics, religion, history or security threats.

Accustomed to a tiny, highly urbanized country, Israelis at Ramah find the overwhelming sense of wilderness and infinite land, water and sky therapeutic. The relief is only temporary.

Despite the blissful remoteness of camp, where the self-contained reality keeps most of the outside world at bay, news from Israel seeped in, which only proves yet again that no matter where they find themselves around the globe, Israelis never fully escape the situation back home.

This summer, of course, the news from Israel couldn't have been much worse, although I have little confidence that things will get better in the months to come.

The headlines hit close to home when my wife and I called Jerusalem as soon as we heard about the suicide bombing attack on a downtown restaurant. Like other Israelis at camp, we wanted to make sure our relatives and friends were not in harm's way.

In a near miracle, my mother-in-law told us she and a friend had entered the Sbarro restaurant to order some food to take away, but then on second thought, decided to go elsewhere for lunch. That may have saved their lives. Less than five minutes later, Sbarro was in ruins, with 15 people dead and 90 wounded in the explosion.

Two months ago when we left for Canada, Israel was hurting. Based on all reports, phone conversations and e-mails from people back home, the pain is now even worse, and nobody can say when the suffering will end.

As we pack our bags in Toronto on the eve of our return to Israel, Muskoka already seems like it's on another planet. And we're not even home yet.

The year of shattered illusions

The year 5761 was not a good year for Israel and the Jewish people. Yasser Arafat's war started erev Rosh Hashanah, and there is no end in sight.

What began as a "peace process" exploded in our faces, with suicide bombings, drive-by shootings and other forms of terrorism.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The year is ending with a grossly misnamed "human rights conference" in Durban, South Africa, in which the Arab/Islamic block is using its political and economic power to further isolate Israel.

If there is an optimistic dimension, it is that the damage could have been far greater, had the farce gone on longer. The past year was marked by shattered illusions, and the realization that the "peace process" was merely another format for continuing the war against the existence of Israel and the right of the Jewish people to a sovereign state in our historic, religious and cultural homeland.

This is the year that Israel and the Jewish people were finally forced to discard the myths of the post-1967 generation and begin the belated response to these challenges.

The violence and Palestinian hatred that underlies it have destroyed the myth that this conflict is the result of Israeli actions and policies.

The naïve hope that if only Israel would change its policies, withdraw from territories and agree to a Palestinian state, all would be well and we would live happily ever after, has been destroyed.

For many Israelis and Jews around the world who held these views, the events of the past year led to the realization that the work of transforming Palestinian and Arab hostility towards Israel has not even begun.

Under the best circumstances, the conditions for peace, in its most basic form, will take at least a generation to develop.

The year 5761 also marked a reassertion of the importance of Zionism and the end of the post-Zionist ideology created by a small group of intellectuals eager to transform Israel into a pale imitation of Europe or Canada. Their efforts to run away from Jewish history and culture were predicated on "normalization" of relations between Jews and Arabs, but the depth of hostility of many of Israel's Arab citizens, to say nothing of the Palestinians, put an end to this myth.

This was also the year that we recognized the extent of the bias and deep-seated hostility inherent among many journalists reporting on the Middle East and among diplomats and officials who depend on them for information and analysis.

Among these groups, the carefully developed images of Palestinian victimization have replaced reality, and any tales, no matter how far-fetched, are duly reported as fact. In their Alice-in-Wonderland world, Israel is automatically the aggressor, terrorists have been transformed into "activists," Israeli counterattacks are "assassinations" and the non-existent "Palestinian occupied territory" is at the centre of the Middle Eastern map.

These distortions, which were allowed to take hold in the past 30 years without challenge, will take many years to reverse, but at least the work has finally begun. Among the more professional and independent journalists, the biases, distortions and sympathy for the Palestinians are slowly being eroded.

It is ironically appropriate that 5761 is ending with the convening of the United Nations World Conference against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance.

This grandiosely named event marks another low point in the cynicism and hostility directed towards Israel and the Jewish people. This effort has been kidnapped by the Arab world, which has again placed the efforts to label Zionism as racism at the top of the agenda, and has sought to reduce the singular horror of the Holocaust.

At the same time, the firm stand taken by Israel and Jewish leaders around the world is a sign of strength, and it has also forged alliances and encouraged supporters, including the United States, and, hopefully, the Canadian government, to repel the assault.

At the start of 5762, we know where we stand, and have a good understanding of our friends and foes. This may not sound overly optimistic, but it is an important step in the right direction.

Shanah tovah.

Sharon fails to keep his campaign promises

Election campaign pledges are the bane of politicians. As they often discover, promises are more easily uttered than kept. Ariel Sharon, who took office six months ago this week after resoundingly defeating Ehud Barak in a special prime ministerial election, assured Israelis that, if elected, he would bring them the balm of peace and security.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Israelis, weary of Palestinian terrorism yet still supportive of peace negotiations with the Palestinian Authority (PA), bought into Sharon's campaign slogans with a vengeance. Sharon trounced Barak by an unprecedented 25 percent margin and thus fulfilled his ambition of becoming prime minister.

Six months on, Israel has neither peace nor security, and Sharon's lofty promises lie in tatters. As the second Palestinian uprising heads into its first year, Israel and the Palestinians are locked in a deadly embrace of tit-for-tat violence, with no resolution in sight. The intifadah, with its roadside shootings, gun battles, mortar attacks and suicide bombings, has intensified, claiming still more Israelis and disrupting the flow and pattern of daily life.

A ceasefire, hammered out on June 13 by George Tenet, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, never took root, and was a sham from the outset. As a result, Israel and the Palestinians have not even implemented the first phase of the Mitchell committee's recommendations, the cooling-off period that is supposed to lead to confidence-building measures and a resumption of political talks, which broke off last January.

Bucking the advice of his foreign minister, Shimon Peres, Sharon refuses to enter into political negotiations while the shooting goes on. By sticking to this mantra, Sharon closes the door to the possibility of dialogue and gives Palestinian rejectionists effective veto power over a possible peace settlement. Meanwhile, Yasser Arafat, the president of the PA, cannot or will not force his militias to lay down their arms. And so the bloodletting goes on, pushing the prospect of renewed peace talks further into the distance and destroying what remains of the bruised Oslo peace process.

Having been chastened by the Palestinians' fighting spirit, Sharon has lowered expectations, and now speaks glumly of the "very long road" ahead facing Israel. In sober tones, he compares the current situation to the 1948 War of Independence, acknowledges that "quick and easy solutions" are not in the cards, and warns his fellow Israelis to pluck up their patience, courage and will.

Despite the gloom, and the widespread perception that Sharon has not lived up to his promises, he is riding fairly high in the opinion polls. The majority of Israelis believe that Sharon, his failures notwithstanding, is a reliable leader, a steady hand on the helm. By contrast, his two predecessors, Barak and Benjamin Netanyahu, were regularly savaged by the mass media.

Sharon's popularity is probably due to several factors. With suicide bombers stalking the land and the PA unable or unwilling to stop them, Sharon's aura of firmness has not gone unnoticed. He is also the beneficiary of a growing belief that an end-of-conflict agreement with the Palestinians is momentarily unattainable, that Arafat is incapable of signing such an accord, that Arab states and some of the Palestinians themselves are hostile to Israel's existence, that the opposition Labour party offers no viable alternative and that the current national unity government, though somewhat shaky, is in Israel's vital interests.

Much to the disappointment and ire of his natural constituency, the right, Sharon has not unleashed the full might of the Israeli armed forces against the Palestinians. On the other hand, given Israel's strikes into Jenin, Hebron and Beit Jala, and Israel's liquidation of Palestinian activists, including the leader of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Sharon has abandoned his policy of relative restraint. In line with this strategy, Israel has, for the first time since the Six Day War, deployed F-16 and F-15 combat jets against the Palestinians in the West Bank.

Although he has escalated the conflict, Sharon presents himself as a pragmatist who understands the limits of military force and whose overriding goal is to wear down the Palestinians in a war of attrition. Sharon claims he has no desire to exacerbate Israel's conflict with the PA or lead Israel into a regional war. "This is a delicate and complex game," he said recently.

Sharon has clearly ratcheted up Israel's response to the plague of Arab terror. He has ordered tanks and bulldozers into autonomous Palestinian areas of the Gaza Strip and the West Bank (Area A). He has temporarily seized Orient House and other Palestinian institutions in Jerusalem and Abu Dis. Sharon, however, has resisted entreaties from the chief of staff, Gen. Shaul Mofaz, to classify the PA as the enemy and to reconquer parts of Area A.

Nevertheless, Sharon has described the PA as a terrorist entity and branded Arafat as a "murderer," a "pathological liar" and "our bin Laden." Although he has expressed regret for his intemperate language, Sharon has declined to personally meet with Arafat, designating his son, Omri, and Peres as surrogates. Sharon has spoken with Arafat only once, by phone on Feb. 9, shortly after his election victory.

Sharon's refusal to engage Arafat in face-to-face talks is incompatible with diplomatic norms, but is completely in accordance with his record. When he was Netanyahu's foreign minister, he deigned not to shake hands with Arafat at the 1998 Wye River talks in the United States. Prior to that, he denounced Arafat in lurid terms. Sharon claims that he will reassess his view of a meeting with Arafat after the Palestinians fulfil their Oslo obligations and end the violence.

Sharon is averse to discussing final status issues – permanent borders, Palestinian refugees, Jerusalem. It will be recalled that they were the key impediments at last summer's failed Camp David summit. Sharon and his advisors believe, rightly or wrongly, that Israel's objective should be crisis management rather than the attainment of a full-blown peace agreement. Sharon's strategic goal is the signing of interim accords with the PA, but the Palestinians want to settle seething final status issues as soon as possible.

Sharon claims he is ready to make "painful compromises" to reach a state of non-belligerency with the Palestinians. But his proposals are unrealistic and disingenuous, to say the least. Barak was broadly prepared to relinquish about 90 percent of the West Bank, all of Gaza and Arab neighbourhoods in eastern Jerusalem for the sake of achieving a workable peace treaty. Sharon is far less flexible, saying he will cede only about 42 percent of the West Bank, which is what the Palestinians already possess. And judging by his plan to build five new villages in the western Negev, Sharon seems opposed to a Barakian land swap: the Halutza sand dunes in exchange for swaths of the West Bank.

In embracing the recommendations of the Mitchell committee, he grudgingly accepted the need for a settlement freeze. By that, Sharon means no new settlements, no further land confiscations and no construction outside the borders of built-up areas. Under pressure from Peres, he recently cut back allocations for settlements in the territories. Sharon, though, has greenlighted the building of 700 new homes in Maale Adumim and Alfei Menashe, both of which are close to the old Green Line.

Sharon's policy with respect to the eastern half of Jerusalem, conquered in 1967 and coveted by the Palestinians as their future capital, is unyielding. He is expanding the Har Choma neighbourhood, started by Netanyahu, and has approved extra funding for infrastructure work in Palestinian-populated neighbourhoods.

Sharon opposes a withdrawal from a cluster of Palestinian villages near Jerusalem, a plan Barak never implemented. And in a departure from past practices, he has said that Jews should be allowed to pray in the Temple Mount compound, where the intifadah began on Sept. 28.

Much to the outrage of Likud party members and Jewish settlers, Sharon displayed remarkable restraint after the June 1 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv which claimed the lives of 21 Israelis. "Restraint," he said in its wake, "is an element of strength."

But of late, in response to a fresh spate of suicide bombings and roadside shootings that have left Israelis feeling vulnerable, Sharon has pressed ahead more vigorously with reprisals aimed at pressuring the PA to squelch terrorism. In the past month, since the Aug. 9 suicide bombing of a Jerusalem pizzeria which killed 15 civilians, Israeli forces have rumbled into the West Bank towns of Jenin and Hebron, in Israel's deepest penetrations of Palestinian-ruled areas in eight years. These raids have elevated Israel's confrontation with the Palestinians to a new, more ominous level. Israel's two-day incursion into Beit Jala, prompted by Palestinian assaults against Gilo, was still more serious.

These incursions, criticized by the United States and the European Union, have not deterred suicide bombers, slowed the intifadah or brought Israelis peace and security.

Jewish, Black slavery claims discussed

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Prior to departing for Durban to attend the UN conference on human rights and racism, a group of Black academics, lawyers and social policy advocates gathered for a two-day meeting that included intense discussion on the question of reparations for Black slavery.

Meeting under the auspices of the African Canadian Legal Clinic, the group heard from lawyer Ed Morgan on the legal issues pertaining to Jewish reparations claims for wartime slave labour.

What they heard likely did not engender much confidence in their prospects for success – at least at the court level, if not at the bar of justice.

Ed Morgan

"The main issue is how to translate the precedent of Holocaust claims into inter-generational claims for those who were slaves 150 years ago. That's the big hurdle that an African-American slavery claim would have to overcome," said Morgan, professor of international law and director of a human rights program at the University of Toronto.

Even in the Holocaust cases, where the claimants were actual wartime slave labourers, initial opposition to their claim was great. "Without high-powered legal and political interventions, it would have been very hard to pursue," Morgan said.

Restitution actions against Swiss banks served as a catalyst for the slave labour claims, he said. And those worked only because they were directed against corporate defendants, not governments, which are entitled to claim legal immunity, he said.

Morgan, who serves as chair of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region, but who attended the meeting in his capacity as a lawyer, said the claim for reparations, particularly in the United States, is an "impossible, or next to impossible, legal claim. But it does have some things going for it... [Claimants] have a good, moral claim,because the Black community is still continuing to suffer the results of the legacy of slavery and discrimination.

"A moral claim could lead government to ameliorate the condition of poor Blacks, who inherited the legacy of slavery and discrimination... If I were an African-American advocate, I'd seize on it as a way of highlighting the inequities of American society."

Morgan distinguished the American situation from the one in Canada, in which the claim for reparations is less persuasive.

Slavery ended in Canada decades before it did in the United States. The number of Black slaves in Canada was much lower than in the United States and Canada served as a haven for runaway American slaves. Furthermore, much of Canada's Black population consists of fairly recent immigrants, he pointed out.

The conference was also briefed on Chinese victims of a discriminatory head tax and on Japanese compensation claims for property lost during World War II. Morgan pointed out that in both cases, claims were brought by individuals who actually experienced the discriminatory actions.

Fans just love Ed the Sock

Ed the Sock

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

TORONTO — The green-haired sock known to audiences worldwide as Ed the Sock began as a faceless prop lying around on the set of a Newton Cable children's television show about 15 years ago.

Since then, the sock has been transformed into a wisecracking, cigar -smoking hand puppet with his own show on MuchMusic, titled Ed's Big Wham Bam, which is geared to teenagers across Canada, and on Citytv, called Ed the Sock, a globally syndicated late night talk show aimed at adults.

Throughout his career, Ed has been called abrasive, obnoxious and even sexist, but character creator and Ed's executive producer Steven Joel Kerzner says despite the wet T-shirt competitions and bikini-clad women portrayed on his show, there are a lot of "pro-social messages" in the script.

In fact, the character has even evolved into what one could call a role model.

Ed the Sock "tells girls not to behave like the women we show," says Kerzner. "We encourage women to be comfortable with their bodies" and tell them not to get their breasts augmented in the hopes of impressing men.

Moreover, "we never have any commentary that degrades women. When we do guest segments, the woman is always in charge. And we don't organize bikini events – these women do it willingly. We don't put them up to it and we never put women on the show who haven't chosen to be there. We never take advantage of or exploit women."

Children who stay up late to watch Ed the Sock run the risk of misunderstanding Ed's underlying pro-women message, but Kerzner absolves himself of all responsibility.

"I'm not responsible for what kids watch. It's the parents' responsibility to monitor what their kids see on TV. The show's on late enough that only adults should be watching."

Kerzner admits that when Ed was first created, the language he used was "nasty. Jokes centred around his alleged sexual exploits and there weren't a lot of socially redeeming qualities to the show."

He explains that Ed was created to mock and model the behaviour of the father of one of Kerzner's friends, who claimed to date a lot of women.

The Ed that exists today is miles away from the original, says Kerzner, emphasizing that since his wife of two years came aboard to produce the show four years ago, Ed has become even more sensitive toward women.

"Liana is somewhat of a feminist. She lets me know when the show's insensitive or when we're going too far. She knows where to draw the line."

Kerzner is tired of producing sexually suggestive shows. "I personally don't like looking at half-naked women anymore – I'm 34 now, but it's what audiences want to see."

In fact, Kerzner says that audiences from Australia and New Zealand have written, asking him to make Ed the Sock even more risqué.

But at the same time, using women on the show, and thereby attracting the attention of young adults, has its advantage; it gives Kerzner the chance to emit "a socially redeemable" message to his television audiences and Web site users.

In his "EDitorials," posted on the MuchMusic Web site, for instance, Ed deplores certain music artists who degrade women in their lyrics and in their music videos.

In another, he criticizes the ignorance of his letter-writing fans, saying, "[M]ost of you who write to me have the language skills of the Incredible Hulk. You can't spell, you can't

JNF 2001 Negev Dinner

Announcement

On behalf of the Board of Directors of the Jewish National Fund of Toronto, Frank A. Wilson, President, is pleased to announce that the 2001 Negev Dinner Honouree is Alex E. Grossman

Alex E. Grossman

The 53rd Annual JNF Negev Dinner will take place at the Sheraton Centre Hotel in downtown Toronto on Sunday evening, November 18th, in the Grand Ballroom. Details, tickets, information and reservations are available by contacting the offices of JNF Toronto by telephone 416-638-7200, by fax 416-638-7345 or by email at tor@jnfcanada.org

Two major projects in Israel will benefit from the proceeds of this tribute to Alex Grossman... one at Massuah, dealing with Holocaust education, and the other supporting the development of a major reservoir to help meet Israel's desperate water shortage.

Alex Grossman was born in Cracow, Poland in 1919. He lived there with his family until the outbreak of WWII. He and his wife Genia came to Toronto in 1950 with their first child Lily and it was here where their son George was born.

Alex Grossman created Belmont Construction with partners Abe Bleeman and the late Joe Silver. Belmont went on to become a major land developer. Alex Grossman has been President of Belmont Properties Inc., President of Grossman Holdings Limited, Chairman of Pinedale Properties Ltd. and is a Director of Egis Holdings as well as Primegg.

His success in business has been matched by an outstanding involvement in the leadership ranks of many organizations within the Jewish community. Alex Grossman has been National Chairman of the Board of State of Israel Bonds, Chairman of the Canadian Friends of Massuah, Chairman of the Board of Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation, Vice-President of the Executive Committee of the Jewish Community Centre and has served on the Board of Governors of the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care. He has also been involved with Survivors of the Shoah, B'nai Brith, Ashkenaz, United Jewish Appeal, Mount Sinai Hospital and University of Toronto. Alex is one of only ten recipients of the Golda Meir Leadership Award in recognition of his years promoting Israel's economic and social progress.

A team of volunteer organizers and canvassers is preparing to launch the Negev Dinner Campaign on September 13th. At that time, JNF President Frank A. Wilson will announce the leadership of the Campaign and of the Dinner organization.

The 2001 Negev Dinner will mark the 100th Anniversary of the founding of the Jewish National Fund in Basle, Switzerland in December 1901 by Theodor Herzl and the delegates to the Fifth Zionist Congress.

Kerzner prefers not to think of Ed as a role model communicate a simple thought, and you think grammar is your mother's mother."

He says reading and going to school are important and even "cool." He encourages readers to "make something" of themselves.

Ed also criticizes kids who smoke, saying, "Cool isn't doing what you think other people will think is cool, cool is doing your own thing and not caring who thinks it's cool. And slowly killing yourself with tobacco isn't cool."

Despite these positive messages, Kerzner doesn't want the responsibility of being a role model, and prefers not to think of his creation as one.

Instead, he says, "I see Ed's role as trying to shake kids and show them what [the world] is all about. Ed is a voice asking them to question what they see [on television] and hear [on the radio]."

Kerzner's desire for audiences to question images that confront them, in part, comes from being Jewish.

"Judaism is a challenge. It asks you to question everything and tells you not to accept things as they are."

Similarly, "Ed doesn't buy into the group mentality."

Neither does Kerzner. While his high school friends may have gone home after school, Kerzner spent his free time working at Newton Cable, which was later bought out by Rogers. By the age of 15, in addition to attending school, Kerzner says he began working full-time at the station, producing shows and helping out with others.

"Back then, cable stations gave you a lot of opportunity to grow and experiment. There were lots of opportunities for those willing to work hard."

Not only did Kerzner produce television shows, but he also hosted a political talk show, and another program called The Jewish Voice. After the creation of Ed, Kerzner went on to produce and give life to Ed's Late Night Party.

In 1994, Kerzner went national and international, taking Ed from local cable stations to MuchMusic and Citytv.

Today, he says his show is often the highest-rated night show on Citytv, and for the past couple of years, has consistently been one of the highest-rated shows on MuchMusic.

Kerzner says his parents and two brothers, both of whom followed Kerzner into the television industry, are supportive of Kerzner, though initially, "my family thought I was insane."

First generation Canadians, Kerzner's parents did not receive a university education. Kerzner's mother was a homemaker while his father owned a sporting goods store.

"My dad worked on his feet his whole life. My parents wanted my brothers and I to go to university so we wouldn't have to work so hard."

Despite his parents' wishes, Kerzner never went to university, wanting only to work behind the scenes on television. Though he says he, like his father, works really hard, "at least I'm doing something I want to do."

And just as his edgy show has given Ed the chance to act as a role model, Ed has given Kerzner the same opportunity. Leaving the Citytv building on Queen St. W. after his interview with The CJN, Kerzner placed a $5 bill into the blackened hands of a homeless young woman, who was lying on the streets with her dog.

"What's $5 to me? To her it means she can eat and feed her dog," he explains. "I hope that if people see me giving money to people living on the street that they'll be encouraged to do it too."

Chabad gets new home in downtown Toronto

TORONTO — The Burnside Talmud Torah, home to Eitz Chaim Schools and Toras Emes Congregation before their move to Viewmount and then to a church, is returning to its Jewish roots.

Burnside Talmud Torah returns to Jewish roots

On Sept. 9, it will be dedicated as the Dr. Max and Gennina Glassman building, and will house Chabad of Downtown. At the same time, a new sefer Torah will be dedicated for use in the facility.

Rabbi Nechemia Deitsch, who, together with his wife Dvora, founded Chabad of Downtown only last year, is excited not only to be establishing a permanent location in a residential area for his activities, but also to be "redeeming" what used to be a Jewish institution.

The two-storey, 4,800-square-foot building will have a shul, which will hold its first services for this year's High Holy Days, a mikvah, a Hebrew school, a learning centre, a teen Torah group, and, next summer, a day camp.

The programs that they have been running at Chabad of Downtown's first location, an apartment on Bedford Road in the Annex, and Shabbat services at the Quality Inn on Bloor Street, will be continued on Burnside, including children's services, bar and bat mitzvah classes, Purim programs and seders, and classes in making challah, charity boxes, candles, shofars, matzah covers and mezuzah cases.

"The best way to teach is by doing," Rabbi Deitsch said.

There are over 15,000 Jews living south of St. Clair, the rabbi pointed out, two-thirds of them between St. Clair and Bloor. He made contact with many of them by the simple tactic of knocking on any doors he saw with a mezuzah.

"I got an unbelievable, great, warm response," Rabbi Deitsch said.

When the time actually come to begin the renovating process, "I called people in the area to see if they were interested [in such a facility]. Everyone was enthusiastic."

In fact, they gave not only moral but financial support.

In fact, he said, since there isn't much else Jewish in the area, once people found out what was going to be there, "they just walked up. Some put on tfillin."

The dedication will begin at 11 a.m. The sefer Torah will be completed by the scribe, and then there will be a march around the area before bringing it to rest in the shul. After that, there will be a sit down lunch.

For more information about the dedication, Chabad of Downtown or the Dr. Max and Gennina Glassman Chabad community centre, call Rabbi Deitsch at 416-924-1457.

חופשת אוגוסט בישראל לקחה אותנו למספר אירועים תרבותיים שאשתף אתכם בחם בשבועות הבאים.

חנוך לוין נפטר לפני שנתיים והשאיר אחריו ירושה של עשרות חצגות. קם ישראל גוריון, שיכור לטוב מצמד חדואים, ויצר חצגת קַבָּרֶט מצויינת מחחומר המתאים לכך. צריך להגיד מראש: חנוך לוין זה כמו גוינֶקה- או שאתה אוהב את זה, או שזה עושה לך להקיא. החחומור מאוד מְקַבֶּרי, חדמויות מראות את חצדדים חכי עלובים בחיים, צדדים שחבויים בכל אחד ואחד,אך שבדרך כלל לא מוצאים את דרכם לחצגות. בין האנשים חתמחונים על הבמה והמצבים חבלתי אפשריים, יש חרבה מקום לצחוק ולמחשבה. אבל שיישאר בינינו.

חברי שמחה שלח לי עוד שורת הגדרות מהמילון שחשבתי שימצאו חן בעיניכם:

אבא- בנקאי שיתן לך מן חטבע.
משרד- מקום שאליו אתה הולך לחרגע מן המתח בבית.
שמועת- חדשות שמתפשטות במחירות הקול.
דמעת- חכוח החחיראלי שבעזרתו מצליחה החולשה חנשית לנצח את הערצמה הגברית.
פיחוק- הדרך היחידה שבה חלק מהגברים חנשואים מצליחים לפתוח את הפה.

Jaballah admitted contact with several leaders of Al Jihad, but said he did not know them by their real names. He discussed with them his Canadian immigration case as well as the political situation in Egypt. The court document quotes a U.S. indictment that states the leader of Al Jihad in London is Adid Abd Al Bari, who has been implicated in disseminating claims of responsibility for the bombing of the two U.S. embassies. Jaballah acknowledge in Federal Court that he "initially sought the assistance of Al Bari under the auspices of the International Office for the Defence of Egyptian Peoples in March 1997 in preparation for his IRB (Immigration and Refugee Board) case" in Canada.

Jack Silverstone

Pointing to the Ahmed Ressam case, in which an Algerian-born terrorist was caught at the U.S. border trying to smuggle a bomb assembled in Canada into the United States, Jack Silverstone, executive vice-president of Canadian Jewish Congress, said a terrorist presence in Canada "is not a fantastic idea. It's reality."

Bernie Farber

Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad, a convicted terrorist responsible for the 1968 murder of an El Al passenger in Greece, was ordered deported more than 10 years ago, but remains in Canada as his case slowly winds its way through the legal system.

"No self-respecting country serious about combatting terrorism would allow a convicted terrorist to remain in Canada for more than 10 years," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada applauded CSIS for exposing the Al Jihad organization.

In other developments, representatives of Jewish communal organizations, agencies and synagogues will gather in early September to discuss security arrangements over the High Holy Day period.

The meeting, which has become an annual event, will hear from an Ontario Provincial Police (OPP) officer on security issues in Toronto, Farber said.

Congress, which is responsible for Jewish communal protection, has also been in touch with CSIS and the RCMP to discuss security issues.

Farber declined to discuss specific security arrangements at Jewish buildings, but he said the community has been at a "heightened state of security" since the intifadah erupted almost one year ago.

Anti-Semitic incidents around the world, particularly in Europe but also in Canada, spiked after onset of the Palestinian uprising.

Evidence in the Ressam case, which indicated Islamic radicals operated in Montreal, "give us pause. But it really reinforces for us the need to be on top of our game," Farber said.

Junction Shul marks 90 years

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Knesseth Israel, popularly known as the Junction Shul, recently celebrated its 90th birthday with a special service and dedication.

It is the oldest synagogue in Ontario still holding services, according to the Ontario Heritage Foundation (OHA).

The service was attended by descendants of the Polish and Russian Jews who were at its first services in the basement of a house at 303 Maria St. in 1909 and later in the synagogue itself, built in 1911.

Records going back to the early 1900s show that among the shul's founders were B. Alexandroff; Abraham Tanenbaum, grandfather of Joey Tanenbaum, one of its current supporters; Joseph Goldstein, grandfather of its current president, Benjamin Usprich; and David Dubrowsky, L. Welman and A. Kronis. A Mr. Alexandroff was president in 1918.

A plaque honouring the synagogue's 90th birthday was unveiled by OHA president Allan Gotlieb, formerly Canada's ambassador to Washington, following the service attended by shul members, politicians and local dignitaries. The plaque will eventually be on the outside of the building at the corner of Maria and Shipman streets.

In celebrating the shul's anniversary, the OHA matched a donation from Joey Tanenbaum and his wife Toby.

Two other plaques adorn the building, one in dedication to Jews who died in World War II, and another honouring Joey Tanenbaum for his generosity in supporting renovations.

The Junction Shul, which drew its name from the nearby CN railway station, is kept alive through the generosity of its 80 regular members who now live in all parts of the greater Toronto area. The Orthodox shul, which holds services on all the Jewish holidays, also has 300 associate members who come mainly for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur.

In the early 1900s, about 200 Jewish families lived in the area – attracted by the railway, the area's slaughter houses, and the chance to open their own shops and own their own homes, said Edwin Goldstein, president.

Joey Tanenbaum's grandfather, for example, was a pedlar who arrived in Canada in 1911 with only $8, and soon saved $200 to send for his wife Chippa Sura, and then for Joey's father and his Uncle Joseph, for whom the Beth Avraham Yoseph of Toronto synagogue (better known as the BAYT) in Thornhill is named. It was also his uncle who started the Tanenbaum scrap metal business opposite the Junction Shul.

Goldstein's grandfather was in the hay and feed business, later expanding into lumber and coal, and bought the building adjacent to the house where the first religious services were held.

As the Heritage plaque indicates, the synagogue evokes the splendour of eastern Europe, with its bimah in the centre of the sanctuary, facing east toward Jerusalem. The second-floor women's galleries are decorated with signs of the Zodiac, representing the 12 tribes of Israel.

Knesseth Israel does not have a rabbi, but it has a cantor, Howard Kamen.

The congregation still has difficulty getting a minyan for the minor Jewish holidays, and frequently the services don't start sharp at 9 a.m. as they should, Goldstein said.

"When the High Holy Days are on, the shul is packed and all the women sit upstairs," Goldstein said. "We take some liberties on the minor holidays, when we let the women sit downstairs."

Occasionally, the shul plays host to bar mitzvahs, although it has had no bat mitzvahs and no women have been called to its bimah.

A cheder is held downstairs on Sundays, and young people from the West Toronto Jewish Community Association help erect a sukkah after Yom Kippur. A mikvah was once a feature of the synagogue, but it has become a sitting room downstairs.

The shul is known for its special kiddush held after every service and sponsored by members of the congregation. The kiddush following the special service and dedication, for example, was sponsored by Joey Tanenbaum and his wife Toby.

The regular members are always pleased to extend a friendly welcome to the associated members, which adds to the special atmosphere and keeps people coming back to Maria Street from as far away as Thornhill, Goldstein said.

The booming voice of Joey Goldstein, cousin of the president, as he leads the shul's unofficial choir and gives page numbers for the service, adds to the informality.

Jewish Life

George Bernard Shaw and Judaism

Books
Bernard Baskin

Every summer, I visit Niagara-on-the-Lake to enjoy plays by George Bernard Shaw and his contemporaries. It is a charming community, and the plays are well produced and entertaining.

Recently, I saw The Millionairess, one of Shaw's lesser dramas, and then read his rather lengthy preface to the play. It contains references to Jews and Judaism. The following paragraph is typical: "Now, no doubt Jews are most obnoxious creatures. Any competent historian or psychoanalyst can bring a mass of incontrovertible evidence to prove that it would have been better for the world if the Jews had never existed. But I, as an Irishman, can, with patriotic relish, demonstrate the same of the English. Also of the Irish. We all live in glass houses. Is it wise to throw stones at the Jews? Is it wise to throw stones at all?"

Of course, Shaw viewed himself as a master of paradox, a contrary- minded wit and a rebel against the established order. Strikingly, he often chose to wear the cap and bells of a jester. The world expected wisdom from him and often received nonsense.

When Hitler rose to power, Shaw took the opportunity to express his ideas about the advantages of human cross-breeding. "Hitler's greatest failure is his bad biology and worse ethnology, in not realizing the dangers of an inbred race and mass fertilization. Instead of exterminating the Jews he should have said: 'I will tolerate Jews to any extent as long as no Jew marries a Jewess.' That is how he could build up a strong solid German people."

Shaw's biological views are the sheerest nonsense. Jews were only about one percent of the total German population. How could the 99 percent of gentiles find enough Jews to marry if they wished to avoid being jailed? Actually, before the Nazis came to power, there was probably more intermarriage among Jews in Germany than in any other western country. Yet, this did not seem to lessen anti-Semitism.

In 1935, Shaw declared that the Jews were not entirely free from blame if they were misunderstood. "They have reared ghettos around themselves and view themselves as God's chosen people." Also, "In the beginning there was no great distinction between Christians and Jews, until the Jews emphasized the difference between themselves and the Nazarenes by adopting all sorts of rigmarole which made it impossible for Christians to worship in the same temple."

Completely unhistorical is this notion that Jews excluded the early Christians from the synagogue and that it was not the Nazarenes who decided to separate themselves from the Jews, preach among the pagans and found their own churches.

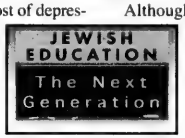
To make out an argument for Jewish exclusiveness, Shaw would deny the whole account in the Christian Scriptures of the founding of a new religion by Paul, of the abandonment of circumcision, the dietary laws and all the rest of the Law by the new sect.

Responding to Shaw's ideas, Rabbi Stephen S. Wise said, "As long as civilized people like Shaw regard Jews as a problem to be solved rather than as a free and equal people, so long will the Hitlers and Mosleys thrive. Fun is fun and spoofing is spoofing, but fun [can] become obscene ribaldry when the Anglo-Irish sage is content lightly to mock at a company of 'assassins and pederasts' who have disposed of their own Bernard Shaws by placing them in concentration camps."

All of this may be "ancient history," and of course, Shaw's ambiguous views about Jews and Judaism were only a very small part of his prodigious output. Still, one can't help feeling that on some matters, the exalted sage should have kept his mouth shut.

Improving our spiritual selves

By ELLIOTT MALAMET



According to a 1997 paper published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, the annual cost of depressive disorders in the United Sates alone is estimated at $43 billion.

This includes such factors as the cost of treatment, missed work time and even premature death. Because of its chronic nature, depression can remain a burden on individuals, families and society at large for a long period of time.

While children and especially adolescents constitute a significant segment of those afflicted, psychological literature asserts that over 70 percent of depressed teenagers do not receive treatment.

The reasons why help may not be sought are complex. In the first place, discerning between the mood swings, which all of us experience in the course of daily stress, and the exhibition of bona fide depressive behaviours may not always be easy for parents or educators to assess.

But on a deeper level, some of the problem is linked to a larger stigma regarding mental health. The movie mogul Samuel Goldwyn is reported to have said, perhaps apocryphally, that "anyone who goes to see a psychiatrist needs to have his head examined."

Although such primitive outlooks regarding the benefits of therapy have lessened within our culture, there is still a vague suspicion on the part of many that psychology is somehow untrustworthy, and that psychiatrists have traded in snake oil for Prozac.

The very admission that one or one's child has mental and emotional difficulties, not to mention more stubborn depressive symptoms, is something that many of us may initially resist. Beyond the uncomfortable feelings within oneself that this engenders, there is also the very real fear of "social weirdness," or the sense that if people knew how I really felt, they would not want to be around me.

So depression goes underground, and its subterranean voyage leaves marked damage on the individual and those around her.

From an educational perspective, the effects of depression in adolescents has important repercussions on how these children learn. In the words of another study, depressed children "make more internal, stable and global attributions for failure and more external, unstable and specific attributions for success, to perceive outcomes as being beyond their control, and to view their futures as hopeless."

Put more simply, a depressed child's view is that when things go badly, they will continue to do so, and for a long time, and when things go well, it was a mere stroke of luck that had nothing to do with his abilities, and would be shortlived in any case.

As Rosh Hashanah approaches, there is an understandable tendency among many Jews to focus on issues such as the ongoing crisis in Israel. Much talk and attention, media scrutiny, political opining and table discussion are devoted to the besieged state of our brethren.

But the proper response Jewishly has always been, and remains, the focus on improving our spiritual selves and perfecting the world around us. That world begins in our homes and schools. It begins by paying attention to children in our midst who need love, patience and support. The wounds of a depressed child cannot be caught on camera. They are only seen by the eye of a caring soul.

Jewish Life

It's time for Selichot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

This coming Sunday morning, people will arrive in their synagogues midway through the night. And they will continue to return very early every weekday until Yom Kippur. They come to recite Selichot (ask forgiveness), take stock of their behaviour over the past year and prepare themselves for the coming one. Today, a look at Selichot and the Internet.

The central phrase in the Selichot service is the recitation of the Thirteen Attributes of Mercy: "Merciful God, merciful God, powerful God, compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abundant in kindness and truth. Preserver of kindness for thousands of generations, forgiver of iniquity, willful sin and error, and Who cleanses." (Exodus 34:6-7). You can listen to the Thirteen Attributes chanted at ORT's wonderful Navigating the Bible site [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?action=displaypage&book=2&chapter=34&verse=6&portion=21].

Rabbi Yitzchak Berkowitz asks why we spend so much effort reciting the Thirteen Attributes and asking God to recall our ancestors' merits on our behalf. Shouldn't we focus on our own spiritual growth rather than invoking this phrase? He then suggests that in order to grow, we need to make sure our own lifestyles reflect these Godly attributes. "For example, the Talmud says that if you are patient with others, then God will be patient with you. You can only demand that God employ all these attributes if you apply them in your own relationships." [http://aish.com/holidays/the_high_holidays/articles/Slichot_and_the_13_Attributes.asp].

Actually, only Ashkenazi Jews are about to start reciting Selichot. Sephardim have been rising early since the start of Elul and will continue to do so for 40 days (excluding Shabbat) until Yom Kippur. (This period parallels the 40 days that Moses prayed atop Mount Sinai asking God to forgive the Jewish people for the sin of the golden calf.) You can read a description of what it is like to arrive bleary-eyed early mornings at San Francisco's Magain David Sephardim Congregation [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk960830/sfayom.htm].

Havurat Lev Shalem, a Reconstructionist congregation in Atlanta, has included their entire Selichot service on their Web site [http://www.mindspring.com/~levshalem/holyslichot5761.htm]. It includes the traditional recitation of "Ashamnu, bagadnu…" (We have acted wrongly, we have been untrue…) during which we beat our chest as we detail a list of sins. They point out that all these sins are mentioned in the first person plural. And they quote Rabbi Abraham Joshua Heschel who said, "Some are guilty, all are responsible." The site comments that "by confessing our sins in the collective 'we,' each of us acknowledges that our sins effect others in our community. In this way we take collective responsibility for one another."

If you want to get really practical about getting yourself into shape, check out Aish HaTorah's Growth Worksheet [http://aish.com/holidays/The_High_Holidays/articles/Growth_Worksheet.asp]. Rabbi Shraga Simmons looks at three areas of self-improvement (Pursuit of Wisdom, Spiritual Connection, Kindness) and lists 50 questions to make you think about how you have led your life and assess where you are going. Some samples:

- Is there any mistake that I commit habitually to the point where it no longer bothers me?
- Have I ever betrayed the trust of a friend?
- In general, do I view events in my life as random occurrences, or as powerful spiritual messages?

For more questions to make you stop and think, take a look at Rabbi Joe Black's Four Weeks of Elul Series [http://www.lsmarketing.com/congalbert/ca-rabbi.htm].

It isn't so easy to repent for your actions, especially if you feel that you have been wronged. The Ohrtmimim Web site quotes the classic story of a simple Jew who was so angry with the injustices that God had done to him that he eventually stopped going to shul, putting on tfillin and even making Kiddush. But when he realized that Selichot week was approaching, he realized that it was finally time to make amends with God. "I invited Him to sit opposite me, poured us two cups of vodka and said 'Listen HaShem, you forget my faults and I'll forget yours.'" [http://www.ohrtmimim.org/torah/archive/holidays/5761/selichot.html]

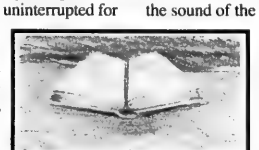
Speaking, listening on Rosh Hashanah

There is a procedure taught in marriage workshops called the "speaker-listener technique." A couple engaged in a sensitive conversation is told to "share the floor." One spouse gets "the floor," and can speak uninterrupted for a few minutes with the other spouse listening intently, and then the roles are reversed. By doing this, both parties get an opportunity to talk without interruptions.



When it comes to hearing the shofar blown on Rosh Hashanah, we have to wonder, who is the listener and who is speaker? Is the shofar a call to God, or is it God's way of calling out to man?

A disagreement about a point of Halachah can help us answer this question. There are two opinions about the correct language for the blessing made before blowing the shofar. Rabbeinu Tam (1100-1171) is of the opinion that the blessing on the shofar is, "Blessed be you God, Lord of the universe, Who commanded us to blow the shofar."

However, Rabbeinu Asher (1250-1328) disagrees, and says that the best language for the blessing on the Shofar is, "Blessed be you God, Lord of the universe, Who commanded us to hear the sound of the shofar."

What is this disagreement about? It's about whether the mitzvah of shofar is listening or speaking. To Rabbeinu Tam, the commandment of shofar includes blowing the shofar; the shofar is our way of calling out to God. (In large congregations, the chazzan acts as our agent in actively blowing the shofar.) To Rabbeinu Asher, the commandment of shofar is to listen, to hear the sound of the shofar.

These views about listening and speaking reflect two ways of understanding the meaning of the shofar. Some view the shofar as an alarm, a rousing wake-up call to repentance. The shofar prods us to stop sleepwalking through life, stop wasting our time on matters empty and selfish, and improve our spiritual lives (Maimonides, Teshuva 3:4). The shofar asks us to listen to its message of spiritual renewal.

There is another way to see the shofar as well. It can be seen as a primal cry, an emotional, wordless communication with God. The sound of the shofar is a unique prayer, a way of communicating with God even when we don't know what to say (Rashi, Rosh Hashanah 26b). From this perspective, together with the chazzan, we speak to God through the sound of the shofar.

On Rosh Hashanah, we are called upon to be both listeners and speakers. It is, of course, the time for repentance; it's about time we listened to the alarm and improved ourselves.

But it is also a unique time, when we have "the floor," when even the sighing sound of the shofar will be listened to intently by God. May we all be fortunate to have God answer our prayers, and give us a year of boundless health and happiness!

FSU Hillel students visit

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Kishinev university student who was here last week tells of a memorable encounter with anti-Semitism.

A classmate once greeted Sasha Sandler with the words, "Hi, Zhid [Jew]." Although he was angry, Sandler didn't reply. After learning from his mother that the classmate was born to a Jewish mother, Sandler confronted him with the news the following day.

"He didn't believe me," Sandler, 22, recalled in an interview at the office of Jewish Campus Services of Greater Toronto (JCS). "But in a few days, he said, 'Excuse me, I didn't know.' From that moment we were best friends. He was an activist in our Hillel club and is now a soldier in Israel."

Sandler, a student of economics law at the International Academy of Business and Law in Kishinev, and Milana Amirgulova, 22, an English student at the University of Languages in Baku, Azerbaijan, were among a dozen of their peers from the former Soviet Union (FSU) to attend the annual Schusterman Hillel International Student Leaders Assembly, held in Pennsylvania, before they travelled to Toronto.

Their visit here – a follow-up to a Passover program through which Toronto students visited Kishinev – included tours of the University of Toronto and York University campuses, and meetings with JCS staff and students as well as with staff of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

The 22 Hillels in the FSU are independent of the universities whose populations they serve. Twice a year, there are FSU Hillel conferences, attended by approximately 300 students, Amirgulova said.

In Baku, as in Kishinev, about 100 students are affiliated with Hillel. Baku is home to three million people, about 15,000 of whom are Jews. There are three synagogues (Mountain, Georgian and Ashkenazi) and a Jewish kindergarten.

Hillel is headquartered in a rented flat. "We don't have campuses," said Amirgulova, who was very taken with U of T's ivied buildings and leafy grounds.

"We didn't even know what [the word] campus meant," said Sandler.

The notion that sometimes lectures are moved outdoors was "like a fairy tale," added Amirgulova.

Among the programs at Baku's Hillel, which opened in December 1999, are the Chase Peer to Peer Lehrhaus program to teach Jewish traditions and history (a program which Sandler co-ordinates in Kishinev), English lessons, Hebrew lessons, weekly Kabalat Shabbat and Havdalah services, a weekly disco, programs based on Russian television game shows, and intergenerational programs with Jewish seniors.

Amirgulova was particularly impressed by the reactions of the elderly. "They were so happy to see us. I think it's a very nice program, and we should develop it."

The religious aspect of Hillel is not totally unfamiliar to Baku, she said. "We had Sochnut [the Jewish Agency] and an Israeli cultural centre existed for maybe 10 years."

Kishinev's Hillel offers monthly Shabbat services

Amirgulova, a Mountain Jew who grew up with some tradition in her home, said she has never felt anti-Semitism in her country. "Now it's very fashionable to be Jewish because you have an opportunity to leave the country for the United States, Germany or Israel. [Many people] want to be Jewish."

In fact, when she returned from a Birthright trip to Israel last winter, some male acquaintances, who hadn't realized she was Jewish, jokingly vied to marry her. "We're a multi-national country – Georgians, Russians, Jews, Tartars, Ukrainians."

'Fashionable to be Jewish'

Amirgulova became involved in Hillel through a contact she made teaching English at a Jewish women's centre. At Hillel, she learned about Passover and how to conduct a Seder, lessons she put into practice almost immediately, conducting community Seders, some at a distance of four or five hours from Baku. "I liked it very much," she said.

Sandler, who studied for a year at a local yeshiva, said that although there were problems in his part of the FSU six years ago, for the most part, "it's okay now." He finds curiosity more typical than anti-Semitism. When he attended a Ukrainian secondary school, however, he was constantly reminded of the fact he was a Jew, he said.

Kishinev's Hillel, which dates back to 1996, offers monthly Shabbat services, which are open to the entire Jewish community, numbering about 20,000. They are also involved in home visits to the elderly, particularly for Jewish holidays. Recently they switched to kosher food for programs, although Sandler noted that it is "very difficult" to keep kosher in the FSU. They buy their kosher challahs from a local Jewish school, he said.

There are perhaps 2,000 observant Jews in Kishinev, a city with a population of less than one million, estimated Sandler. He expects he will stay there.

Likewise, Amirgulova said she likes Azerbaijan, but she expects to spend time out of the country once she finishes her master's degree, to perfect her English.

In Baku, there is a small kosher outlet, but the food is too expensive for Hillel's $7,000 annual budget, which must cover rent and the director's salary. To save money, they use cola instead of wine for Kiddush (a strategy also used in Kishinev).

Although there is outreach to unaffiliated students, sometimes it's hard, said Sandler. Sometimes students say they don't need Hillel, or they don't admit to being Jewish.

Sandler and his peers often have to innovate on the job. When a rabbi died in another town last year, he was among a group asked to lead Yom Kippur services. Although none of them had the knowledge or expertise, six of them prepared, with only one week before the holiday. "People liked it," said Sandler. "We saw tears in their eyes... We have to help our community."

Amirgulova reports that her Hillel conducted Rosh Hashanah services for 500 people. "Maybe we make some mistakes," she acknowledged, "but he who makes no mistakes makes nothing."

Steinhardt impressed by Montreal Hillel model

By DAVID LAZARUS

MONTREAL — The Hillel organization here has, over the last four years, turned its approach completely around, said Eddie Shostak, president of City-Wide Hillel.

Hillel activities and programming, Shostak said in a recent interview, were once in the hands of the administrators, but they are now organized, planned, fund-raised for and run by the students themselves, which has given them a feeling of empowerment and motivation they didn't have before.

The transformation within Hillel has been so dramatic, Shostak said, that American Jewish philanthropist Michael Steinhardt, who is president of the board of governors of Hillel International, met with five Montreal Hillel representatives during the summer, to examine whether the Montreal Hillel model could be used in the United States.

Campuses share a unified vision, ideology

Acquaintances of Steinhardt in New York, Jonathan Rabinow and Steve Eisenberg, who had attended a Shabbat program in Montreal last March that drew upwards of 500 students, arranged the meeting in Steinhardt's Manhattan offices. He met with Shostak and four other local Hillel officials – Andrew Elbaz, Mike Hirschfield, Albert El Sayegh and Charlie Hadid.

The meeting was supposed to last 20 minutes, but it went on for 2½ hours, Shostak said.

Shostak and others were due to meet later with Hillel International president Richard Joel to further examine the possibilities.

So how did Montreal Hillel transform itself?

Shostak said it began about four years ago, during Edward Elbaz's tenure as Montreal Hillel president.

The first step was the idea to "centralize" Hillel, by having all Montreal Hillel campuses share a unified and consistent vision, ideology and focus, instead of each campus going off in its own haphazard direction. The umbrella group was called City-Wide Hillel.

The next step was a "shift" in ideology, Shostak said. Do not accept mediocrity. Be creative, innovative, bigger and better. Do not plan events that are not likely to be successful. Remember that you're trying to appeal to 7,000 Jewish college students in Montreal, not a few hundred.

Step 3 was to open up a student bank account, to let the students, rather than the Hillel staff or director, have the "power of programming." Still, Hillel staff and professionals would remain "key" elements for success in providing resources and in helping to facilitate student programming, Shostak said.

These steps led to having "students running the organization for students," he said.

"Student empowerment led to student accountability, and accountability led to results."

And just what have the results been? A Hillel where it's actually considered cool to be part of, he said. The Shabbat dinner for 500, a Purim party attended by 1,500, a student pro-Israel rally that drew hundreds, a Hillel now perceived as "the place to be," not as a hangout for Jewish "nerds" that Shostak agreed was its previous image.

"Hillel has been doing its job," he said. "Traffic has grown exponentially. There's a a wide spectrum of student leadership that make up the heart and soul of the organization."

At the meeting with Steinhardt, Shostak said, Hillel representatives asked for his support, both financial and moral, in helping to guide them to others they could present the successful Hillel model to.

"This is absolutely huge," Shostak said. "It could totally turn around the future of Jewish life in North America. We're the present, but we're also the future."

When Billy met baseball, it was true love

By MICHAEL JACOBS
Special to The CJN

PHOENIX — Comedic slugger Billy Crystal and baseball are the best of friends.

One of the foremost comics of his generation, Crystal is as creative talking about baseball as he is engaging on stage.

"My love of baseball has never stopped," says Crystal, part owner of the Arizona Diamondbacks. "My infatuation with the complexities and simplicities of the game are always growing. I go to a lot of events because I love to watch athletes and I still love to play, but as those times dwindle, you look at it in a different way."

Billy Crystal

"Making the movie *61 afforded me the chance to fully experience a summer that I just loved as a 13-year-old, and also a chance to bring it to life for 13-year-olds now, who know nothing about Mickey Mantle or Roger Maris or the Yankees or that season or of baseball in that time," he says. "[It was a time]when players didn't wear earrings and the word rehab didn't appear on anybody's baseball card. And you stayed with the same team and players lived in the neighborhood. It was eight teams in both leagues and if you won the pennant, you went to the World Series. It was a different game.

"I've done a lot of interesting and different kinds of projects in my life and felt like I was connected to them. But none of them compared to the feeling I had every day in the pre-production of *61."

Every stage of the process, from planning the movie and working on the script to casting the characters and shooting the movie, "was just one of the most romantically interesting times for me. We transformed Tiger Stadium in Detroit, which was vacant, into the most perfect duplication of Yankee Stadium you could find," Crystal says.

Crystal remembers the first time he played catch with his childhood hero, Mickey Mantle.

"Well, I started crying. It was for a special in 1985 for the All-Star game. It was on NBC and Mickey was the guest. And, at the end of the show, we were on the field. So, I was walking with Mickey, which was always a great thrill anyway, and he pointed to a little house that I could barely see, and he said, 'You see that little red house?' And I said 'Yeah.' And he said, 'I hit two home runs off that house – one righty and one lefty in the Hall of Fame Game. I think it was in 1953.' So, we marked it off from home plate out to where this house was and it was 640 feet. Two of them from different sides of the plate. Amazing," Crystal says.

"So then... he started throwing with me and I threw back and I started to well up. And he said, 'What's the matter?' I said, 'I got something in my eye,' and he said 'What?' And I said, 'You.' I tried to get it right to him because he was limping, and when you try to get it to someone you miss them by a beat. So I just bounced it and I said, 'Oh, I'm sorry I didn't get it to you.' And he said 'Hey, I'm sorry. If I would have gotten to it, I would still be playing.' I had a pretty great chance to get to know him as well as I did."

Crystal, who is a pioneer of show business – he has played such diverse roles as Miracle Max in The Princess Bride (1987), Harry Burns in When Harry Met Sally (1989), Mitch Robbins in City Slickers (1991) and has hosted the Academy Awards three times ('91-'93, '00) – decided to invest as a part-owner of the budding team when he had a chance to get to know the Diamondbacks front office.

"I love Phoenix," he says. "I think the town is fantastic. I thought the fans were ready for this step into the major league world.

"I thought it would be a great, fun investment. And I'm sorry that I haven't been able to be there as much as I'd like because I've just been swamped the last couple of years. I've only been to two or three games. The first one [I attended], I sat behind Dan Quayle and I thought 'If this is my permanent seat, then who do I talk to?'"

Crystal has praise for The Life and Times of Hank Greenberg, a documentary on the first Jewish Hall of Famer.

"I thought [the film] was just great," he says. "I knew Hank a little bit. In fact, I think the first time I was ever in a hot tub was with Hank Greenberg. I know this is going to sound weird. I had just moved to L.A. from New York in '76. It was at a resort where we were in a tennis tournament together and I'd never been in one before. And afterwards I was at a spa. I'd never even seen a Jacuzzi.

"So you put on a robe and then you're naked and you get into the tub, and it's the great Hank Greenberg. He said 'Hello.' And I said, 'Hello.' He said, 'Where are you from?' and I answered him. And then he said, 'Look at us, two Jews in a tub.'

"And then I played in a tennis tournament with him. We played against Mark Fidrych and Pedro Segura. The thing about him was that he couldn't move great, but he was so big that he would just place it, and then you'd run and he'd walk into position. It used to drive people crazy. And he kept hitting Fidrych in the head or in the chest at the net. And I said, 'What are you doing?' And he said, 'These pitchers – you can't let them intimidate you.' He was a great man and an important man."

Some favourite recipes for the holiday

Jewish Theological Seminary has sent along the following recipe for Rosh Hashanah. It is from the kitchen of Michele Lifshen Reing, JTS's assistant director of publications:

DOUBLE CRUST WALNUT HONEY TART

Dough

2 sticks margarine
1 cup plus 3 tbsp. granulated sugar
4 egg yolks
zest of 1 lemon
1 tsp. vanilla
3¼ cups sifted all-purpose flour

Filling:

1 stick margarine
8 oz. light brown sugar
½ cup honey
1 16 oz. pkg. of chopped walnuts (almonds, pecans or macadamia nuts may be substituted)
1 beaten egg

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a 10-in. springform pan with margarine or vegetable shortening. Cut a round circle of parchment paper to fit inside bottom of pan, insert and grease the paper.

Make the dough: combine margarine and sugar in mixing bowl. Beat on low speed until very light. Add yolks one at at time, then add lemon zest and vanilla. Slowly add flour while mixing on low speed and mix until just combined. Scrape dough out of bowl – it will be very soft – and divide into roughly half (for best results, one piece should be slightly larger than the other). Set aside at room temperature.

Prepare a filling: combine margarine, brown sugar and honey into a heavy, medium-sized saucepan. Bring to a boil and continue boiling for 4 minutes. Remove from heat and fold in walnuts. Allow to cool slightly, about 15 minutes.

Assemble the tart: take the larger of the two pieces of dough and press in bottom of pan and about 1 in. up the side. Gently add the walnut filling into the pan, spreading evenly to the sides (filling should be about the same height or lower as the dough up the sides of the pan).

On a well-floured, flat 10 in. surface (a tart pan bottom or cardboard circle works well), carefully roll out remaining dough into a 10-in. circle. Slide dough carefully onto tart filling.

Press and smooth dough, sealing edges with dough on the sides of pan. Brush it with the beaten egg. If desired, use a fork to score the dough, creating a decorative pattern. Bake in centre of oven for about 50 minutes, or until top is golden brown.

Traditional foods reflect spirit of the holiday

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are a time of introspection and sincere repentance, as Jews ask God to forgive their sins and inscribe them in the Book of Life for another year.

The spiritual contemplation and reflection are enhanced by eating certain traditional foods that have become known for their symbolism and good omens.

Apples and honey are perhaps the most popular of Rosh Hashanah foods. The apple is an allusion to the fragrance of the field mentioned in relation to Isaac's blessing of Jacob in Genesis 27:27.

In addition to being sweet, the word honey is numerically equivalent to the Hebrew phrase Father of Mercy, and thus it is customary to include honey, and foods made with it, on the Rosh Hashanah menu.

Challah carries meaning throughout the Jewish year. The two braided Sabbath loaves are eaten to remind Jews of the 40 years the Israelites wandered the wilderness looking for the Promised Land of Canaan after being freed from bondage in Egypt. Bread fell from heaven daily, providing sustenance for the Israelites, though none fell on the Sabbath and the Jews collected a double portion on the sixth day of the week.

On Rosh Hashanah, the Hamotzi is recited over a round – not braided – challah filled with raisins. The round shape is said to symbolize the cycle of life, while raisins add sweetness to the bread. The first piece of challah is dipped in honey to symbolize a sweet new year.

On the first day of Rosh Hashanah it is also traditional for the congregation to walk to a nearby stream for the service of the Tashlich where everybody throws bread into a body of running water. Dating back to the 14th century according to some estimates, the service represents the custom of symbolically casting away our sins.

Below are a few different challah recipes you may want to try on Rosh Hashanah (and Shabbat) to symbolically cast away your sins and usher in a sweet new year.

As well, Daphna Rabinovitch, Canadian Living associate food editor and co-host of Canadian Living Cooks on The Food Network, was pleased to allow The CJN to once again – we spoke to her last Passover – publish some of her favourite holiday desserts.

Observing these traditions is as much a part of Rosh Hashanah as are prayer, repentance and hearing the shofar.

The following recipes are from Rabinovitch's personal collection.

SPICED APPLE COFFEE CAKE

¾ cup unsalted butter, softened
¾ cup granulated sugar
¾ cup packed brown sugar
3 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
2⅔ cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
1½ tsp. baking soda
½ tsp. each cinnamon and salt
2 cups sour cream or plain yogurt

Filling:
2 large tart apples
⅓ cup packed brown sugar
2 tsp. cinnamon
½ cup chopped pecans

Peel, core and quarter apples. Slice four of the quarters; place in bowl. Chop remaining quarters; place in separate bowl. Toss each with half each of the brown sugar and cinnamon.

In large bowl, beat together butter, granulated sugar and brown sugar until combined; beat in eggs one at a time, beating well after each addition. Beat in vanilla.

Combine flour, baking powder, baking soda, cinnamon and salt. Using wooden spoon, stir dry ingredients into butter mixture alternately with sour cream, making 3 additions of flour and 2 of sour cream.

Arrange apple slices in overlapping circle in ungreased 10-in. bundt pan. Scrape half of batter over top. Sprinkle with chopped apples, then pecans. Spread with remaining batter.

Bake in centre of oven at 350 for 55 to 65 minutes or until top is golden and cake tester inserted in centre comes out clean. Let cool in pan on rack for 20 minutes. Invert onto cake plate; serve warm. Makes 12 servings.

LEMON APPLE BUNDT CAKE

3 cups all-purpose flour
2 cups granulated sugar
1 tbsp. baking powder
1 tsp. salt
¼ cup vegetable oil
4 eggs
1 tbsp. grated lemon rind
3 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tsp. grated orange rind
2 tbsp. orange juice
2 tsp. vanilla

Filling:
6 tart apples
¼ cup granulated sugar
1½ tbsp. cinnamon

Filling:

Peel, core and slice apples; combine in bowl with sugar and cinnamon; toss well to combine.

In large bowl, combine flour, sugar, baking powder and salt. In separate bowl, whisk together oil, eggs, lemon rind and juice, orange rind and juice and vanilla. Make well in centre of dry ingredients; pour in wet ingredients and using wooden spoon, until well combined.

Spoon ⅓ of batter into greased 10-in. tube pan. Sprinkle half of the apples over. Spread another third of batter over apples. Top with remaining apples and then remaining batter, spreading evenly.

Bake in centre of oven at 350 for about 1 or pulsing, until the dough just comes together. Knead lightly into disc. Cover with plastic wrap and refrigerate for 30 minutes or for up to 2 days.

Filling:

In large bowl, toss together apples, sugar, flour, cinnamon and lemon juice.

On lightly floured surface, roll out dough to 16-in. circle, 1/8 in. thick. Roll up dough onto rolling pin and transfer to ungreased baking sheet.

Leaving a 3-in. border, arrange apples in concentric circles, overlapping the slices, in centre of dough. Fold pastry up over the filling, letting it fall naturally into folds and leaving at least three inches of the filling exposed.

Whisk egg lightly to break up; brush over pastry. Bake in the centre of oven at 400 for 40 to 50 minutes or until apples are tender and bubbling and crust is golden and crisp. Serve warm. Makes 8 servings.

Some core tips on baking with apples:

Rabinovitch and the Apple Growers of Ontario association say that certain types of apples are better than others for baking cakes and pies and making sauces. Here's what we learned:

McIntosh – excellent for eating and for using in pies and sauces, but they are not recommended for cooking or baking because they will not hold their shape.

Gala – good for eating, cooking, baking, and for pies and sauces.

Northern Spy – excellent for apple cake because they hold their shape, so you'll get a beautiful appearance and a crunch.

Ida red – excellent for cooking, baking and making pies and sauces.

Spartan – good for pies and sauces but OK for cooking and baking.

For more apple recipes and information on the fruit, visit www.ontarioapples.com. If you want to pick your own apples, September is the season to start. Visit www.harvestontario.com to find an apple picking farm near you. –ES

The magic of a cold chicken sandwich

By FREIDELE SOBAN
Special to The CJN

Freidele Soban sent the following in reponse to our request from readers for holiday memories and food ideas.

As an adult, I have to admit that I do not look forward to Yom Kippur. I must be honest about that. (Could I be anything else at this time of year?)

The truth is, I am a terrible faster and by the time Neilah rolls around, I feel positively weak in the knees. As a child, however, I could hardly wait for Yom Kippur to arrive as I knew that I would be getting my special cold chicken sandwich.

As was the custom in my family, before Yizkor would start, my mother, who did not have to stay at that time, would go home with me from shul so that I could eat lunch. Every year, it would be the exact same delicious meal.

My mother would cut off the meat from the pulke that had been boiled in the chicken soup for the previous night's seudah. Placed between two slices of challah with just a sprinkling of salt, it was a very simply prepared sandwich, but nothing compared to its taste. Made from only three ingredients, it tasted practically holy to me.

However, lest I should not realize the importance of the day and that it was, in fact, a fast day, I was not allowed to indulge in a pickle with my sandwich. In that small way, I too was fasting. Somehow though, I did not fully put the whole concept together because one year after I finished bentshing, I asked my mother why there wasn't a special line in the bentshing for Yom Kippur like there was for all of the other holidays. Only later did I really understand why.

It did not bother my mother to make my lunch for me even though she was fasting and as I would eat, she would just sit with me. She would then tell me, every year, how it was for her when she was a little girl on Yom Kippur and was not fasting yet either.

In her shul, there was a man who would bring the little blue-purple plums for all the children to snack on during the service. They had just come out for the season around that time and my mother and the other little girls would go back to the women's section and sit and eat their plums while they waited for the same woman who fainted every year to faint, be laid out on the back row and revived by a whole lemon with cloves stuck in it that someone always knew to bring.

Eventually when I turned 12, I started to fast. I was in no rush to join the adults as my sister had, starting at 10 to fast the entire day. I did though join my family's honey cake tradition as we still do today. The last thing we eat before we start the fast is a piece of my mother's delicious honey cake filled with apples and raisins and it is also the first thing we eat to break the fast.

Many years have passed by and my mother can no longer leave before Yizkor and I can no longer eat my special lunch on Yom Kippur. Missing my cold chicken sandwich, I have had it a few times over the years on a regular weekday but somehow it has never tasted the same as it did when I'd eat it on Yom Kippur. One day, I hope to be able to pass down my memory of fasting on Yom Kippur to my child, like my mother did with me.

minutes or until smooth and elastic, dusting with enough of the remaining flour to prevent sticking.

Place dough in large greased bowl, turning to grease all over. Cover with plastic wrap; let rise in warm draft-free place until doubled in bulk and indentation remains when dough is poked with two fingers, about 1 hour. Punch down dough; knead in raisins; let stand for 5 minutes.

To make a crown: Roll into 30-in. long rope. Holding 1 end in place, wind remaining rope around end to form fairly tight spiral that is slightly higher in the centre. Transfer to lightly greased baking sheet.

To make a braid: Divide dough into quarters; roll each into 18-in.-long ropes. Place side by side on greased baking sheet; pinch 1 end together. At pinched end, move second rope from left over rope on right. Move far right rope over 2 ropes on left. Move far left rope over 2 ropes on right. Repeat until braid is complete; tuck ends under braid. Cover crown or braid loosely with plastic wrap. Let rise in warm, draft-free place until doubled in bulk, about 1 hour.

Stir egg yolk with 1 tsp. water; lightly brush over loaf. Sprinkle with sesame seeds. Bake in 350-degree oven for 35 to 45 minutes or until golden brown and loaf sounds hollow when tapped on bottom. Let cool on rack.

Tip: You can make the challah dough the night before. After the first rise, cover it well and refrigerate. The next morning, bring it to room temperature for 45-60 minutes before kneading in the raisins and proceeding with the recipe as directed.

Holiday Food Ideas

Sweeten your new year with some luscious desserts

By NORENE GILLETZ

Special to The CJN

Here is a collection of sweet delights for your holiday table that are sure to please! Most call for traditional ingredients such as apples and honey in order to guarantee a sweet year. The recipes come from four popular Jewish cookbooks, both new and old. They all share one common element – great taste! Have a sweet and healthy New Year and enjoy in good health!

If you are watching your fat intake but still want to enjoy a traditional holiday treat, try this excellent apple cake from my low-fat cookbook, MealLeaniYumm! .

Applesauce replaces the oil, and egg whites replace one of the eggs to keep the fat content low. One slice contains 198 calories and just 1.4 grams of fat. The cake will be moister the next day. You can also bake it in a springform pan. For a crowd, double the recipe and bake it in a 9 x 13 pan.

FABULOUS LOW-FAT APPLE CAKE (Pareve)

2 eggs (or 1 egg plus 2 egg whites)
1 cup sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
½ cup unsweetened applesauce
2 tbsp. water
1½ cups flour (you can use half whole wheat)
2 tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. cinnamon
6 apples, peeled and thinly sliced
¼ cup brown sugar, firmly packed
2 tsp. additional cinnamon

Preheat oven to 350. Beat eggs, sugar and vanilla until light. Add applesauce and mix well. Add water, flour, baking powder and ½ tsp. cinnamon. Mix just until flour disappears. In another bowl, mix apples with brown sugar and cinnamon. Spray a 7 x 11 Pyrex pan with nonstick spray.

Spread half of batter in pan. Spread apples evenly over batter. Top with remaining batter and spread evenly. (If you wet your spatula, the batter will be easier to spread.) Bake at 350 for 45 to 55 minutes, or until golden brown. Makes 12 servings. If frozen, cake will become more moist. Just reheat it for 10 minutes at 350.

This scrumptious recipe comes from Montreal baking maven and cookbook author Marcy Goldman's excellent Web site, www.betterbaking.com. Goldman is also the author of A Treasury of Jewish Holiday Baking. Chocolate swirls its way through this moist, marbled honey cake, which is topped with grated semi-sweet chocolate. It's a winner!

TWISTED HONEY CAKE (Pareve)

Honey Spice Batter:
1¾ cups all-purpose flour
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ tsp. baking soda
¼ tsp. salt
1½ tsp. cinnamon
¼tsp. cloves
¼ tsp. allspice
½ cup vegetable oil
½ cup honey
¾ cup white sugar
¼ cup brown sugar, packed
2 eggs
½ tsp. pure vanilla
½cup brewed tea
¼ cup orange juice

Chocolate Batter:
1½cups all-purpose flour
⅓ cup cocoa, measured and sifted
¼ tsp. salt
½ tsp. baking soda
1½ tsp. baking powder
1 cup white sugar
½cup brown sugar, packed
½ cup vegetable oil
2 eggs
1 tsp. vanilla
1 cup cola, flat

Garnish:
½ cup semi-sweet chocolate, grated confectioner's sugar, optional.

Preheat oven to 350. Generously spray a 9 or 10-in. tube pan with cooking spray.

For honey spice batter, place flour, baking powder, baking soda, salt, cinnamon, cloves and allspice in a bowl. Blend with a whisk, then make a well in the centre. Stir in oil, honey, white and brown sugars, eggs, vanilla, tea and orange juice. Blend well to make a smooth batter. Set aside.

For chocolate batter, in a separate bowl, combine flour, cocoa, salt, baking powder and baking soda. Make a well in the centre and whisk in white and brown sugars, oil, eggs, vanilla and cola. Blend well to make a smooth batter.Pour honey spice batter into prepared pan. Top with chocolate batter.

Place pan on a baking sheet and bake for 55 to 65 minutes or until cake springs back when gently touched.

Cool 10 minutes, then unmould and place on a serving platter. While cake is still warm, sprinkle on grated chocolate and allow to melt. If you prefer, chill cake to set chocolate and then dust with confectioner's sugar. Makes 12 to 16 servings.

Here is an oldie but goodie. The recipe comes from A Treasure for my Daughter, which was first published in 1950 by Ethel Epstein, Ein chapter of Hadassah of Montreal. Now in its 12th printing, this treasure of a cookbook was recently revised and reprinted. The recipes now include temperatures, times and yields, which is a major improvement from previous editions. (This recipe reminds me of my late grandmother patting her teiglach mixture out on a big wooden board on her dining room table, then cutting them into diamond shapes.)

HONEY TEIGLACH (Pareve)

3 eggs
3 tbsp. oil
⅛ tsp. salt
1 tbsp. sugar
2 cups sifted all-purpose flour (about)
½ cup honey
¼ cup sugar
1 tbsp. powdered ginger
1 cup chopped walnuts and coconut, to garnish

Make soft dough of eggs, oil, salt, 1 tbsp. sugar and flour, kneading with fingers until smooth enough to handle easily. Pinch off small pieces of dough and roll out each piece on lightly floured board or countertop to ½-in. thick. Cut in ½-in. pieces. Place on well-greased baking sheet. Bake in oven preheated to 375 until light brown, about 20 minutes, shaking the pan once or twice. Remove from baking sheet with spatula.

Meanwhile, combine honey, ¼ cup sugar and ginger; bring to a boil. When rapidly boiling, drop pieces of dough into syrup one at a time, then add nuts. Remove from stove, stir to distribute evenly. Spoon into greased shallow baking pan, place again in oven with heat reduced to 350 until honey has been absorbed, about 20 minutes. Remove from oven, turn out on moistened board and pat down with knife or fingers. (If using fingers, dip hands in cold water.) Cut into pieces 2 inches high. Sprinkle coconut over top. Makes 36.

This delicious cookie recipe comes from Toronto's Lillian Kaplun, author of For the Love of Cooking and Baking. This book is a tribute to a wonderful lady, truly a legend in her own time. I've tasted these addictive cookies many times because they are a specialty of my friend's mother-in-law, Zelda Kaplan (no relation)! Zelda shapes her cookies into crescents and they are always a hit. Forget about your diet and enjoy!

BUTTERFINGERS (Dairy or Pareve)

1 cup butter (scant) or margarine
5 tbsp. sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
2 cups all-purpose flour
1 tbsp. water
1 cup finely chopped nuts (e.g. almonds)

Cream butter, add sugar gradually and cream thoroughly. Add vanilla. Add flour gradually, beating well after each addition. Add water. Fold in nuts. Shape into fingers. Bake on greased cookie sheet 2 inches apart at 350 for 15 to 20 minutes, or until done. When cool, roll in icing sugar.

Variation: For coffee flavour, add 2 tsp. instant coffee granules after blending the butter and sugar.

Crofter's jams are organic and Kosher — an unbeatable combination!

Crofter's uncrates its exciting new look for your holiday table!

The Crofter's story starts with organic farming, free of chemical fertilizers, pesticides and herbicides. Once harvested, our fruit is carefully processed at reduced temperatures to minimize loss of flavour, colour and vitamins. All of our products have high fruit content and low sugar content, and all of our ingredients except for the natural apple pectin (0.8%) are certified organic. Nature's finest bounty, in ten delicious flavours!

Blueberry: We use certified organic wild blueberries from Quebec. Small in size but very rich in flavour, they are much tastier than cultivated blueberries.

Morello Cherry: We are especially proud of our Morello cherries, a variety grown in Europe. Unlike the widely used Montmorency cherry, which is of light colour and weak flavour, these Morellos are dark sour cherries, providing a beautiful colour and taste experience.

Apricot: Whether we use our Spanish or California pitted apricots, both origins guarantee plenty of sunshine to ensure a high, naturally occurring sugar content and lots of flavour.

Blackberry: We use certified organic wild blackberries from Chile which are small in size and very rich in flavour.

Sicilian Blood Orange: Scary name, delicious taste! Unlike typical English marmalade, we use the whole orange with its red flesh, not just the peel. The Sicilian red orange is the "Matriarch" of oranges, full of flavour, giving you a new dimension in orange marmalade.

Strawberry: The use of Northern varieties including Hoods, Totems and Senga Senganas guarantees a superior flavour.

Raspberry: The raspberries used by Crofter's are selected for their exceptional colour and flavour and are grown in Chile.

Mango: Close your eyes and taste the sweetness of the Caribbean. A real Tropical Treat!

Black Currant: These tart European berries are very high in vitamin C and add some zest to your breakfast.

Four Fruit: Quadruple your pleasure with this tantalizing medley of red berries: organic raspberries, strawberries, cherries, and red currants!

Cane juice vs. fruit juice sweetening: fact & fiction

All our fruit spreads are sweetened with organic cane sugar (dehydrated cane juice), which, after inversion, has exactly the same molecular structure as the sugars supplied by grape juice concentrate. The non-organic grapes commonly used to sweeten jams are one of the most heavily sprayed fruits due to their tendency to mould quickly. That's why we prefer organic cane sugar. Whether your concerns are health-related or environment-related, it pays you to investigate the facts.

PRIME RIB ROAST
(or Brisket)

Place roast fat side up in a roasting pan. Season with pepper, paprika and ginger (optional). This can be done the day before. Cover and refrigerate. Preheat oven to 500. Roast for 30 minutes. Add 2 tbsp. oil to roasting pan. Reduce temperature to 350 and continue roasting for 1½-2 hours depending on whether you like your meat rare or well done. If desired, add small whole onions, small potatoes, carrots and parsnip.

Using a meat thermometer, check for doneness: 120F to 125F – rare; 125F to 130F – medium rare; 135F – medium; 140F – well done.

Place the roast on a platter and let rest for 15-20 minutes before carving. Serve with the vegetables.

Gravy: 1 cup kosher red wine.

Skim off the surface fat from roasting pan and discard. Reserve the pan juices and scrape the browned bits of roast from the bottom of the pan. Combine wine pan juices. Pour into small saucepan and simmer gently for 5 minutes over low heat. Transfer to a gravy boat and serve hot alongside the roast. (Suggested serving size 3 to 5 ounces). Serves 10-12.

Holiday recipes from the Kashruth Council

Garnish:
2 tsp. toasted sesame seeds or dried dill moistened with a little lemon juice or water to revive its aromatic flavour.

Wash beans, snip off ends. In a medium saucepan, bring water to a boil; add beans and cover. Cook over medium heat for 10 minutes. Drain and plunge into a large quantity of cold water for several minutes. (This preserves the colour and texture). Drain, set aside.

Heat the oil in a skillet. Add the pepper strips and mushrooms. Sprinkle with garlic powder and cook until crisp tender, stirring frequently. Place all ingredients in a bowl and sprinkle with salt and pepper. Toss gently. Transfer to a serving platter and sprinkle with garnish of your choice. Serves 6-8.

PIQUANT SALAD (Pareve)

6 cups spinach or lettuce
1 medium Vidalia onion, thinly sliced
1 red pepper, sliced
1 10-oz. can whole mandarin orange segments drained salad dressing (see recipe below)

Wash spinach or lettuce thoroughly and dry well. Place all ingredients, except dressing in a glass bowl and mix well.

Dressing (Pareve):
1 tbsp. canola oil
2 tbsp. cider vinegar
2 tbsp. light soy sauce
1 garlic clove, crushed
1 tbsp. sugar
1 tbsp. dry kosher wine

Mix all ingredients well and combine with the salad. Serves 6.

APPLE/PLUM PIE

Food Processor Pie Pastry (Pareve):
2½ cups all purpose flour
1 tsp. salt
½ lb. pareve shortening
1 egg yolk
1 tbsp. vinegar

Combine egg yolk and vinegar in measuring cup and add club soda to make ½ cup liquid.

Put flour and salt in food processor bowl. Turn on/off. Add shortening, process on/off until cut into flour and resembles small crumbs. With machine in operation, add liquid. Process until ball just forms. Do not over-process. Chill for about 1 hour. Cut in half and roll out to fit a 9½-inch pie plate.

Filling:
5 cups apples, peeled and sliced
2½ cups fresh plums, pitted and sliced
1 tbsp. lemon juice
1 tsp. cinnamon
1 cup brown sugar
⅓ cup flour

Mix ingredients together and put into crust. Top with other half of pastry. Punch holes to allow air to escape.

Preheat oven to 450 and bake for 10 minutes. Reduce temperature to 350 and continue baking for 35-45 minutes or until crust is golden and fruit is tender.

Variation: Replace plums with peaches. Serves 8.

Cut the fat, save the taste, says the grill guy

By JUDY BART KANCIGOR
Special to The CJN

Some things just naturally go together: meatballs and spaghetti, Sacco and Vanzetti, Jewish food and fat.

Not anymore! Steven Raichlen, the grill guy (The Barbecue Bible, How to Grill), slashes his way through the schmaltz belt with Healthy Jewish Cooking (Viking), a lusciously photographed homage to his family with tasty renditions of more than 150 classic Jewish recipes that nourish the soul without damaging the heart.

> 'The biggest surprises in the book are that chopped liver can be healthy and that schmaltz isn't as bad for you as everybody thought'

"I was a restaurant critic for a major city magazine in the '80s, eating out constantly, and developed a cholesterol problem," recalls Raichlen, so he began reducing the fat in his favourite recipes.

The result was his High-Flavor, Low-Fat series and Healthy Latin Cooking, which won a James Beard award. No Pritikin Spartan, Raichlen now applies his Ten Commandments of low-fat cooking to the last bastion of the clogged artery, Jewish food, with "think flavour, not fat" as his mantra.

"The great cooks of my childhood – who came of age during the Depression – were more interested in filling plates than in the health consciousness of their dinners," he writes. And with his slimmed-down versions of his family's beloved recipes, we can have our knish and eat it too.

His Grammy Ethel's chopped liver uses the cholesterol-laden liver for flavour, replacing most of it with mushrooms, and roasting instead of sauteing. For his Aunt Annette's legendary matzah balls ("rabbis would drive from Washington, D.C., to Baltimore just to have a seat at our Passover table") he reduces the amount of schmaltz, winning a "thumbs up" from 92-year-old Aunt Annette.

"The biggest surprises in the book," notes Raichlen, "are that chopped liver can actually be healthy and that schmaltz isn't as bad for you as everybody thought."

Compared to butter, schmaltz, which contains water, actually has one-third the amount of cholesterol and half the amount of saturated fat.

"That's not to say schmaltz is a health food – far from it – and you definitely use this golden elixir in moderation," warns Raichlen.

It is this common sense approach to creating a healthy life-style, not short-term deprivation, that makes Raichlen's books so appealing.

"Next to lemon juice, which is always wonderful in anything, and freshly ground black pepper, my favourite ingredient in low-fat cooking is extra virgin olive oil. That's a fat, but a judicious little fillip drizzled on top adds such a lovely flavour."

Using wonton wrappers and filo instead of high-fat dough produces tasty kreplach and strudel. His bake-frying method is equally successful with empanadas and pirogi.

Less of a challenge are the Sephardi recipes, which naturally rely on greater use of grains, beans, fruits and vegetables than those of his eastern European forebears. But where Sephardi dishes call for deep frying, Raichlen solves that problem neatly with what he does best: grilling.

"Barbecue Bible took me four years to write," says Raichlen, who travelled to 25 countries on five continents researching the book, writing Healthy Jewish Cooking during the same period. "There was a lot of overlap. The Middle East is one of the real hotbeds of grilling expertise. Barbecue is not part of the Ashkenazi tradition. I don't ever remember watching my grandfather grill, for example. None of the great cooks of that generation knew anything from fire cooking, but in Israel it's very much a part of their culture."

So what will on the Raichlen table this Rosh Hashanah? Surprise, surprise.

Son Jake Klein of Heartbeat at the W Hotel in New York (and incidentally the brilliant food stylist for Healthy Jewish Cooking) will be visiting, and together father and son will fire up the grill.

"We will probably be the only Jewish family in Miami to barbecuethe oven with dried fruits. We will rub it with cumin, paprika, garlic, salt and pepper and smoke it for six hours. It will be amazing barbecue, the way God meant for you to eat it!"

The purists among us may prefer to serve Raichlen's Holiday Brisket with Dried Fruit and Sweet Wine, the fruit symbolizing "a hope for sweetness and plenty in the coming year."

While his Carrot and Apple Kugel is more traditional for Rosh Hashanah with its apples, honey and carrots symbolizing prosperity and happiness, he also recommends Yukon Gold Potato Kugel with the sweet meat. With the naturally buttery flavour of the Yukons, you'll hardly notice the reduced fat.

THE AMAZING LOW-FAT - CHOPPED LIVER

Preparation time: 10 minutes
Cooking time: 20 minutes
8 oz. mushrooms
1 medium onion, quartered
1 tsp. canola or olive oil
salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
2 oz. chicken or turkey liver
5 eggs
2 tbsp. chopped fresh parsley, plus sprigs for garnish

Preheat oven to 450. Trim the stem ends off the mushrooms and wipe the caps clean with a damp paper towel. Quarter any large mushrooms; halve medium-size ones; leave any small mushrooms whole. Place the mushrooms and onion in a non-stick roasting pan and toss with the oil, salt and pepper. Roast the mushrooms until lightly browned, 8 to 10 minutes, stirring to ensure even cooking.

Add the livers and continue roasting until the mushrooms are well browned and flavourful and the liver is cooked but still pink in the centre, 8 to 10 minutes more.

Meanwhile, hard-cook the eggs, following the instructions on page 194. (Cook them for 11 minutes.) When cool enough to handle, peel and halve the eggs. Remove and discard the yolks. Cut each white half in half.

Place the mushrooms, onion, liver, hard-cooked egg whites, and parsley in a food processor and grind to a coarse puree. (Run the machine in short bursts.) Correct the seasoning, adding salt and pepper to taste: the mixture should be highly seasoned. Transfer the chopped liver to a bowl or platter, garnish with parsley sprigs, and serve with crackers or toasted challah.

Note: For a richer chopped liver, keep two of the egg yolks. The fat will still be below 4 grams per serving. Makes 1½ cups, serves 6 to 8.

HOLIDAY BRISKET WITH DRIED FRUITS AND SWEET WINE

Preparation time: 15 minutes
Cooking time: 3 to 4 hours
1 (3-lb. beef brisket), trimmed of all visible fat
salt and freshly ground black pepper, to taste
1½ tbsp. canola oil
1 large onion, finely chopped
2 carrots, finely chopped
2 stalks celery, finely chopped
2 cloves garlic, finely chopped
¼ cup chopped parsley (preferably flat-leaf)
1½ cups grape wine
2½ cups beef or chicken broth or water, or as needed
2 bay leaves
1½ cups dried apricots (8 oz.)
1½ cups pitted prunes
1 cup golden raisins

Preheat oven to 350. Lightly score the brisket on both sides in a cross-hatch pattern, using a sharp knife. Season the brisket all over with salt and pepper. Heat the oil in a non-stick frying pan. Add the onion, carrots, celery, garlic, and 3 tbsp. parsley and cook over medium heat until lightly browned, about 5 minutes.

Spoon half this mixture into a roasting pan or baking dish just large enough to hold the brisket. Lay the brisket on top and spoon the remaining vegetables over it. Add the wine, broth, and bay leaves. Tightly cover the pan and bake the brisket for 1½ hours.

Transfer the brisket to a cutting board and thinly slice it across the grain. (An electric knife works great for slicing.) Stir half the dried fruits into roasting pan juices. Lay the sliced brisket on top. Arrange the remaining dried fruits on top. Season with salt and pepper. Add broth as needed to cover the meat and fruit.

Continue baking the brisket until the meat is tender enough to cut with a fork, an additional 1½ to 2 hours. Add broth or water as needed to keep the meat and fruits moist. If there's too much cooking liquid, uncover the pan the last half hour to allow some of it to evaporate.

Transfer the brisket to a platter. Using a clotted spoon, transfer the fruits to the platter around the meat. Discard the bay leaf. Pour the pan juices into the sort of gravy boat that allows you to pour the broth off from the bottom, leaving the fat on top. If you don't have one of these, pour the gravy into a bowl or measuring cup and skim the fat off the top with a ladle. Spoon some of the meat and fruit, serving the rest on the side. Sprinkle the remaining 1 tablespoon parsley over the meat and serve at once. Serves 8.

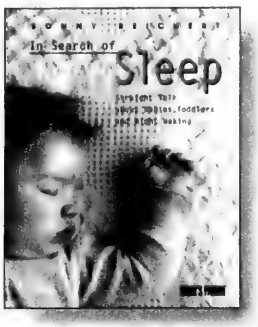
Baby's bedtime can be a challenge

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — For many new parents, putting a baby to sleep can be a greater challenge than they ever imagined.

Bonny Reichert's new book, In Search of Sleep, looks at some approaches used by parents, as well as many of the myths and fallacies associated with baby's bedtimes.



Many of the books out there are not honest about what it is really like to put your baby to sleep because they present a single approach, Reichert said in an interview. "There really can't be only one way to put a baby to sleep."

In Search of Sleep presents a more three-dimensional view, suggesting that children are different, parents are different and family priorities are different.

While letting your baby cry themselves to sleep may work for some, Reichert suggests that waking up to comfort your baby or bringing a crying infant into the parental bed may be more effective for other families.

The loaded question of whether your baby is sleeping through the night can often leave new mothers feeling guilty or defensive. In addition, the assumption that a "good" baby sleeps through the night can leave parents confused over the right way to put their babies to sleep, Reichert said.

But every child is different and every family situation is different. There really can't be any right or wrong approach that will work for every child.

Reichert's book looks at some of the personality traits which might affect a baby's sleep patterns and suggests different approaches which might work, given the needs of the child.

The book is intended to give parents alternative approaches so that they come away feeling more comfortable about the choices they've made.

Nothing is worse than the parents of a child with one set of personality traits judging the techniques used by parents of children with different kinds of personalities, Reichert noted.

Author Bonny Reichert and her two boys.

Criticism can come from anywhere, she added. "It may come from your partner, parents or from in-laws."

But, a mother really knows best what works and doesn't work for her and her child. Reichert views In Search of Sleep as a support book for parents who may feel that more standard sleep techniques are not working for them.

Reichert, who is the mother of two children, James and Leo, was born in Edmonton and attended the Talmud Torah until she moved to Toronto to attend the University of Toronto.

After studying at Ryerson University's school of journalism, Reichert began writing articles about children, challenging some of the more popular theories regarding issues such as temper tantrums.

"The advice I was getting from people didn't really seem right for my child. So I began investigating and writing about issues that were important to me."

Coast to Coast

Don't despair for Ezra

Pity the luck of Ezra Levant. By most accounts, Levant has his heart in the right place and is a passionate supporter of Israel. Although brash and not entirely experienced in the arts of nuance and finesse, Levant performed well as Preston Manning's question period co-ordinator during the old Reform days. But he was never really accepted as "one of the guys" by the coterie of Preston's Soldiers (as his staff was often called).

Levant then joined the National Post and offered a high-energy and colourful perspective on a variety of subjects. He could have hung out at the Post indefinitely, but loyalty to the cause compelled him to return to Ottawa and try to help Stockwell Day withstand the storm. It proved to be a short-lived adventure.

The truth, as Peter C. Newman recently pointed out, is that the effort failed despite Levant – not because of Levant. Unlike many who had come to Day's assistance, Levant recognized early on what was really going on. Perhaps because he had also been a former staffer to Manning, Levant understood that the issue wasn't Day's competence, but rather Day. Some Alliance MPs weren't willing to pursue the aggressive approach advocated by Levant. Something had to go – and it turned out to be Levant!

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

So after some soul-searching, Levant came up with a new plan. Seeking the ultimate personal vindication, he has decided to pursue the riding of Calgary South-West when Manning resigns later this year. All things being equal, Levant has a good shot at the nomination and a fair shot at winning the by-election. But his timing may be a problem.

Now that Stephen Harper has signalled his intention to re-enter the political fray, Levant's world has again been up-ended. If Harper wins the leadership race – and that's a fair bet – he will need a seat in the House of Commons, and guess which seat he has selected? You got it, Calgary South-West.

So where does all of this leave Levant? In a word, nowhere. He'll have to go back to the drawing board and plot a new strategy to win respect and credibility.

In his favour are three things. First, underneath the brash exterior, Levant is bright, engaging and inherently decent. Second, he is still young (not yet 30) and will have been perceived to have paid all the dues one can reasonably be expected to shell out. Finally, he is too good a resource for the Alliance – or any other group, organization, or agency – to squander.

Even if developments over the next few months follow the above scenario, don't despair for Levant. You can't keep a good man down.

And, at the end of the day, Levant really is a good man – especially when it comes to Israel.

Report on alleged war criminal to be made public

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC) will next week release what it calls a "powerful case" against a member of a Nazi military unit that was responsible for the deaths of tens of thousands of Jews in Lithuania and Byelorussia (now Belarus).

Juozas (Joseph) Kisielaitis, faced with deportation from the United States for concealing his wartime association, has been living in Canada since the mid-1980s with the knowledge of the government, CJC says.

At a Sept. 12 press conference, national executive director Jack Silverstone and other CJC officials will be joined by New York private investigator Steven Rambam who has prepared a 130-page report on Kisielaitis, who moved in the past year to Montreal from Ontario. The report, plus certain attachments that will not be made public, have been turned over to Canadian authorities.

Silverstone said CJC is highlighting this case as a "glaring example" of what it regards as the reluctance of the Justice Department's War Crimes Unit to act against certain suspected Nazi war criminals, even a man like Kisielaitis on whom the U.S. has a lengthy file.

Kisielaitis has admitted under oath to being a member of the battalion, but said he served in a non-combatant role as a tailor and did not accompany the unit on its killing sprees. Rambam's research alleges that Kisielaitis was listed as a rifleman and that he was sent on a mission in Byelorussia.

The report, an advance copy of which was released to The CJN, alleges that Kisielaitis, now 80, volunteered for the Lithuanian 2nd Auxiliary Police Service Battalion (later known as the 12th Lithuanian Schutzmannschaft Battalion) in 1941.

During 1941-42, this battalion assisted in the execution of at least 130,000 people, primarily Jews, Rambam says.

In the report, Rambam reproduces two original 1941 Lithuanian documents and their translation, whose source is the U.S. government. The first lists a Juoza Kisielaitis as a recruit and rifleman of the battalion. The second lists 464 members, including a Juoza Kisielaitis, who "left" for the Minsk-Borislov-Slutsk region of Byelorussia on Oct. 6, 1941, ostensibly to fight the "Bolshevik" army and partisans. Historians have recorded that the battalion killed at least 30,000 civilians in Byelorussia that month, Rambam says.

Both documents bear the authentication of the U.S. Embassy in Vilnius in 1993.

Kisielaitis has claimed he remained behind in Lithuania. The report reproduces Kisielaitis' 1981 handwritten statement to the U.S. government that his company, made up of tailors, shoemakers and other "helpers," did not go with the rest of the battalion that day, but stayed in Kaunas. The report also includes the transcript of his 1982 deposition to U.S. District Court in which he again acknowleges he joined the unit.

According to Rambam's information, Kisielaitis and his family immigrated to Canada in 1948, and he became a Canadian citizen in 1953. In 1963, he moved to Massachusetts to accept a job. He was granted permanent residence, but never became a U.S. citizen.

In 1981, staff attorney Eli Rosenbaum of the U.S. Justice Department's Office of Special Investigations (OSI) interviewed Kisielaitis. The United States had already denaturalized and deported at least three other 12th Battalion members.

On May 24, 1984, the OSI formally accused Kisielaitis of "assisting the Nazis in the persecution of persons because of their race, religion, national origin or political opinion."

He was ordered to appear before an immigration judge to show cause why he should not be deported for misrepresenting his membership and activities in the 12th Battalion upon his entry to the United States.

Rambam says Kisielaitis fled to Canada in 1985. "The U.S. Justice Department, after confirming Kisielaitis' presence in Canada, provided the Canadian Department of Justice and the RCMP with a complete copy of their files on Kisielaitis," according to Rambam's findings.

On March 5, 1985, Joseph Krovisky, U.S. Justice Department public affairs officer, told the media: "We confirmed that Kisielaitis was a war criminal living in the U.S. He entered the U.S. under false pretenses, concealing his service in a Nazi unit."

On April 30, 1985, then Canadian solicitor general Robert Kaplan said: "If the Americans have compiled a dossier of evidence, as they seem to have, the Canadian government should move to obtain it and take immediate action. I would hope they don't refer this one to the commission on war criminals in Canada."

From what he considers reliable sources, Rambam learned that the Canadian government informed Kisielaitis in 1987 that no evidence in their possession would allow his deportation from Canada as a war criminal.

In 1996, Rambam, going undercover as a university professor, interviewed Kisielaitis at his Burlington, Ont., home. He later moved to Cornwall. Rambam says he interviewed him again in July, going to his Montreal home unannounced as his true self.

A seven-page transcript of that interview is included in the full report, but will not be made public.

Silverstone said CJC has raised the Kisielaitis case with the government on "numerous occasions" over the years since the '80s.

"The government has told us nothing. Like all individual cases, it cites privacy considerations. It's frustrating."

Rambam told The CJN that he hopes publicizing his research on Kisielaitis will put the War Crimes Unit "on the spot."

Israeli military attaches visit Ottawa

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — As part of the changing of the guard for Israel's military attache to the United States and Canada, outgoing military attache Maj.-Gen. Zeev Livne and his successor, Maj.-Gen. Moshe Sukenik, recently visited Ottawa to meet with Canadian military and political officials at a dinner hosted by Haim Divon, ambassador of Israel to Canada.

The military attache, accredited to both countries, is stationed in Washington.

After four years in the role, Livne says he leaves with a sense of accomplishment as well as a feeling that there is still room for improvement in the relations between the countries.

"I told the defence minister that we still have a lot to do. There is much more to do between the two defence establishments, and I believe that Canada can gain more than we can because of the unfortunate combat experience we have gained during the past 53 years," said Livne.

"We are more than willing to share our experience with Canada. [The defence minister] plans to come to Israel and I hope that this time, he will pay an official visit to the Israeli defence minister," he said.

'New stage in the relations between our two countries'

"The same goes for the chief of the defence staff and the chief of the army. Both are very much willing to come to Israel. It could be a new stage in the relations between our two countries."

Livne has had an opportunity to travel extensively in Canada, participating in several tours for foreign military attaches arranged by the Canadian military.

"The tours gave us the opportunity to meet Canadian officers and soldiers. It was also an opportunity to meet with military attaches from other countries and to explain a bit about Israel," said Livne.

"Canada is very involved in peacekeeping around the world and many lessons that we have learned can be used by Canadians in order to better protect them and better allow them to fulfil their mission," he said.

After 39 years of service, Livne plans to retire when he returns to Israel and to enjoy his family at home in Hadera.

Sukenik spent a year in the United States as liaison officer for trade, and visited often on business in his former position.

"Zeev was my commander in 1987, so it was good for me to come here and to be briefed by [him]. I really wish him all the best. He deserves it after so many years of service."

During his post, Sukenik plans to continue what has been started and to strengthen relations between Israel and the United States and Canada.

He also plans "to do whatever I can in my field. I know that Zeev did a good job and I want to continue it, to explain our point of view. Coming straight from Israel, I see this as a first priority."

Another goal is to strengthen the relationship between Israel and the Jewish communities of the United States and Canada.

"It is very important that Jews around the world understand, not what they see on CNN, but our point of view. It is very complicated and the media is doing a lot of damage to Israel. I will travel to various communities and speak as much as possible," he said.

CIJR gets help from Aspers for pro-Israel efforts

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The independent Canadian Institute for Jewish Research (CIJR) recently announced that it has received an unexpected "bar mitzvah" gift from media mogul Israel Asper and his son David.

Frederick Krantz, CIJR's founder and volunteer director, recognized the Aspers' donation at the academic organization's annual fund-raising event, which also celebrated its 13th year.

The Aspers head Winnipeg-based CanWest Global Communications Corp., the largest newspaper publisher in Canada, whose holdings include the National Post as well as Global Television.

In June, Israel Asper blasted the Canadian government for its "shameful and wrong-headed policy on Israel, as represented by its pro-Palestinian votes at the United Nations."

He also criticized some media coverage of the Mideast conflict, particularly coverage by CBC television. Krantz read a letter from the elder Asper that congratulated the CIJR for "disseminating the truth about the Mideast."

Ariela Cotler, who hosted this year's reception, praised CIJR as "the only game in town" in its efforts to make Israel's side known in the media and to keep the Jewish community informed.

CIJR board member Evelyn Schachter said CIJR, more so than any other Jewish organization in Canada or the Israeli Consulate, has shown Jews how to respond to the negative perceptions about Israel during the latest crisis.

Israeli Consul General Shlomo Avital also praised CIJR for its "day in, day out struggle to protect the image of Israel" against Arab propaganda demonizing the Jewish State.

The CIJR was founded during the first intifadah 13 years ago by a small group of Jewish academics who wanted to respond to what they saw as unbalanced reporting on the conflict and to provide ordinary members of the Jewish community with the information they would need in order to defend Israel's case, said Krantz, a Concordia University professor.Its role remains much the same today, Krantz said, although it relies on donations from individuals, almost all of them Montrealers.

This year's reception raised about $100,000.

The Rabbi who flew

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

Everyone knows a lot about what rabbis do. They are in charge of the synagogue services, they give a long speech on Shabbat and holy days, they come and visit people who are sick, and they answer questions. Not many of them fly, however.

At least, none of the ones I know do. But Rabbi Frum, of the town of Gill, did, at least according to Renate Dollinger, in her delightful book The Rabbi Who Flew (Booksmythe, 2001), which she wrote and illustrated.

Now, flying can be a very useful thing to be able to do, but there can be unexpected problems.

Rabbi Frum was a wonderful rabbi. Not only was he a very kind and sweet person, but he was a terrific teacher, and a very wise man. He put his whole body and soul into his prayers.

And that's where everything started. Rabbi Frum didn't fly because he had wings, or anything like that, but because he prayed with so much kavanah, such total concentration on the meaning of the prayers and the importance of what he was praying, that he just lifted off the ground.

Yankel and Moshe were nine-year-old boys who went to the cheder, the Hebrew school, in the town of Gill. (Gill was a very small town called a shtetl, where there was one butcher, one school, and one shul. Everyone, the book explains, was either poor or very poor.)

One Shabbat, Yankel and Moshe were in shul. They were astonished to see that when the rabbi prayed, his feet left the floor. Soon, he began to lift higher and higher, until he was actually flying around the synagogue.

Well, the other people in the synagogue noticed too. (Wouldn't you notice if your rabbi did that?) Everyone began to talk about it, and soon even people from the neighbouring town came to watch.

Moshe's father was the town shoemaker. When the rabbi was flying over him, he saw that this very special man had holes in the soles of his shoes. Moshe's father was very worried about the rabbi's shoes. In the first place, what would people think about a town that allowed its wonderful rabbi to go around with holes in his shoes? If they told the rabbi, he would be terribly embarrassed, and that, Moshe's mother Beyla pointed out, would be "a mortal sin."

(In fact, embarrassing someone is considered a terrible thing in the Jewish religion – the sages say that it is as if you killed someone.)

Moshe had a wonderful idea. He suggested that his father should take a measuring stick to shul and measure the rabbi's shoes as he flew over. Then, Moshe would sneak into the rabbi's bedroom, take the shoes back to be fixed, and then sneak them back in.

Renate Dollinger is a famous Jewish expressionist painter – that means her paintings show how she feels about something, rather than exactly how it looks. You will really enjoy the pictures in The Rabbi Who Flew – the colours are bright and cheerful, probably much more cheerful than shtetls actually were.

I especially liked seeing the rabbi's face as he was flying – he was on such a high spiritual level that he didn't even realize what he was doing!

This book is intended to be one of a series of books about life in the shtetls of Europe, told by the fictional Grandma Hanne Sheyne.

Anti-Jewish sentiment at Durban conference

'Hitler should have finished the job,' states poster

That interaction began last week. Canadian Jewish delegates, in a meeting last Thursday with federal multiculturalism minister Hedy Fry, who is heading Canada's delegation, urged Fry and other senior officials not to rule out walking out of the WCAR, which began Aug. 31 and will run to Sept. 7, if the anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist rhetoric doesn't stop.

Fry "has given us very strong assurances that she will not tolerate this kind of language. And she was very sympathetic to the concerns we expressed at the atmospherics and how we must be feeling as a Jewish caucus," Landy said.

"I mean, you just have to walk in there as a Jew and you feel extremely threatened."

Last Thursday, foreign affairs minister John Manley announced he would not attend the WCAR, as Jewish groups had wanted. Earlier, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell said he would stay away, mainly because of the revival of the Zionism-is-racism issue as a major item on the conference's agenda.

Equating Israel with apartheid was a major theme at the NGO forum, Landy said.

"This is post-apartheid South Africa, which is looked upon as beacon of human rights because it defeated the apartheid regime. There's a lot of imagery here that seems to find its way to delegates who are looking now to find a new apartheid state, and they've landed on Israel."

Delegates saw "very professionally done posters saying, 'They're killing our children.' There are pictures throughout the site describing Israel as a racist, apartheid state. There's a book of cartoons put out by the Arab Lawyers Union that [shows] the most classic anti-Semitic depictions of Jews with hooked noses and fangs dripping with blood. It would make Der Sturmer proud," Landy said, referring to the Nazi Party's official newspaper.

"It's within this atmosphere and context that there are supposed to be discussions and dialogue leading to a consensus declaration at the end of the NGO conference."

The NGO forum began Aug. 28 and ended last Saturday. Jewish delegates were resigned to a final declaration – although not binding on the WCAR – that would single out Israel for harsh language.

If the climate doesn't change leading into the WCAR, "there would no purpose in staying and we would leave," Landy said. But more important is "to call on the Canadian government to assess the situation, and if the language does not change, at least to have the minister leave. And if any of the bad language remains in the [final] declaration, we want Canada to object," as it did at past UN conferences on racism in 1978 and 1983.

Only 1,000 or so NGOs will be permitted into the WCAR, and they will be observers only. "There will be very little role for us to play [at the WCAR]," Landy noted.

Keith Landy

Prutschi, who hopes to attend some of the WCAR sessions, said organizers of the NGO forum "abdicated all neutrality" by allowing the depiction of Israel as an apartheid state. "And that's the phenomenal obscenity of it, that in South Africa, where apartheid was overthrown, this venue is being used to present Israel as a new apartheid state."

Asked whether he would quit the conference if things don't improve, he said, "We're still playing it by ear. We certainly left it open for us to be here."

As for whether Fry and other senior Canadian officials would leave, Prutschi said his sense was that this is "certainly something that is very much on the table. If in the next few days they come to the conclusion that there really is no possibility of meaningful change, then we have encouraged the minister herself to walk out."

Fry did not commit herself one way or another to quitting the conference, he added, but the Canadian delegation was firm in opposing anti-Jewish language. "There were no ifs or buts. It was 100 percent clear opposition to that, and a guarantee that would be the stand of Canada."

In other developments, a rowdy group of Arabs and Palestinians attempted to disrupt a commission (meeting) on anti-Semitism that was being presented by the Jewish caucus.

"They came in and tried to shout down the speaker," said Karen Mock, co-chair of the international Jewish caucus. Wielding the gavel, Mock called for a recess, "and during the break there was almost a riot. They wanted their issues on the agenda of the commission."

Karen Mock

Mock said the planned disruption was defused when a South African parliamentarian urged calm, security personnel arrived and when the meeting continued without giving in to their demands.

The mayhem added to the feeling of intimidation felt by the Jewish delegates. Thousands of South Africans and Palestinian held an emotional anti-Israel demonstration near the conference site. Spotted in the crowd was a poster saying, "Hitler should have finished the job" while the notorious anti-Semitic tract, the Protocols of the Elders of Zion, was sold at the demonstration, Mock said.

Jewish delegates "were warned, especially if we were visible Jews, or identified with the caucus, to say very far away from the demonstration," she added.

Montreal member of Parliament Irwin Cotler, a member of the Canadian delegation, warned that the inflammatory language that emanated from the NGO forum "could find its way" into the WCAR.

If incorporated into a final declaration, anti-Zionist language would undermine the UN's integrity and hurt the Mideast peace process, even among doves in Israel, Cotler stated.

Other members of Canada's official delegation are Toronto-area MP Jean Augustine and Canada's ambassador to the UN, Paul Heinbecker.

Both sides claim victory over Beit Jalla

By PETER HIRSCHBERG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Immediately after the Israel Defence Forces' withdrawal from Beit Jalla, which took place before daybreak last Thursday, both Israeli and Palestinian leaders tried to present the ceasefire deal – which had facilitated the army's exit from the Palestinian town – as a victory.

Israel said Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat had been forced to take action against the shooters in the Palestinian town, while the Palestinians insisted that they themselves had forced the army out.

The directive for the withdrawal of the IDF came after a three-hour meeting of the security cabinet overnight last Wednesday, and after a day of intensive, behind-the-scenes diplomatic activity. Diplomatic sources said the next day that the troops and tanks would remain near Beit Jalla and would re-enter the town if shooting at Gilo resumed.

"If the shooting is resumed, we will consider our steps," said a more circumspect defence minister, Benjamin Ben-Eliezer, not wanting to commit publicly to any IDF action ahead of time.

"We have to act with presence of mind," he said. "I don't want to issue threats, but I hope this time that Arafat will keep his word."

The Palestinian media reported the army withdrawal as a victory, emphasizing only this element of the ceasefire understanding – and not Arafat's pledge to stop the shooting. The ceasefire was achieved last Wednesday in no small part due to the contacts between Foreign Minister Shimon Peres and the PA chairman.

In Beit Jalla, Palestinians celebrated the pullback.

"Our people taught the Israeli occupation a big lesson," Hassan Abed Rabbo, the local leader of Arafat's Fatah group, told The Associated Press.

However, Israeli leaders – at least a few of them – had a different take.

Newly appointed minister Dan Meridor said the operation could be penned into Israel's victory column because Arafat had been forced by the government – through a combination of diplomatic and military means – to agree to take measures to stop the shooting at Gilo.

Other government ministers argued that the operation had sent a clear message to the Palestinians, that they would pay a price for continued shooting at Israel's capital.

"The army only left after it was clear that the shooting had stopped," said Likud Minister Tzipi Livni. "Our intention was never to re-conquer Beit Jalla and to stay."

But not all government ministers were towing the "victory" line last Thursday, with Public Security Minister Uzi Landau insisting that the decision to pull out was a mistake, because Arafat's pledge to stop the shooting at Gilo could not be believed.

"The State of Israel made another mistake [by withdrawing]," said Tourism Minister Rehavam Ze'evi of the far-right National Union party.

"Firstly, we embarked on this [operation] 10 months late. For almost a year, we allowed shooting on a section of our capital city, which is something that the weakest of states would not have accepted. And when we did do something, we did it with too much restraint."

A valuable editorial

As Israelis search for a way out of the violence that has been thrust upon them, the idea of a unilateral separation from the Palestinians has been gaining momentum in important political and intellectual circles.

But opposition to the idea has also been intense.

Paul Adams, the Globe and Mail's new Mideast correspondent based in Jerusalem, wrote an informative article on August 27 on this important debate. The following day, acknowledging Adam's piece, the Globe published an editorial, "Why a Mideast fence won't work," in which it joined the opposition, calling unilateral separation "a terrible idea."

The editorial is fair and judicious. It understands the predicament Israelis find themselves in. "As violence rises, and prospects for peace grow even more remote [with about 80 percent of Palestinians supporting suicide attacks on Israel's civilians] many Israelis are saying that the country should forget about trying to negotiate a peace agreement or even to quell the Palestinian uprising with military might. Instead, it should build a fence around the West Bank and shut the Palestinians out."

Yet, argues the Globe, as appealing as this idea is to many Israelis, it won't work and it won't stop the violence – as many other Israelis also warn.

The paper continues with what it considers an even more important point, that "separation would mean perpetual conflict between Israel and the Palestinians."

This line should be read and pondered by all those people, including journalists and commentators, who naively argue that if Israel would only "end the occupation" the conflict would end.

However, as the Globe correctly explains, the conflict must be resolved through negotiations. Critics who have continually demanded that Israel withdraw unilaterally, and have (unjustly) accused Israel of violating international law by remaining in the territories, have apparently never read UN Security Council resolutions 242 and 338. These alone govern the disposition of the territories, and state that the parties are ordered to "negotiate" land for peace: Israel is to give up land acquired in 1967 in a war of self-defence, but only in the context of full peace and security guarantees from its Arab neighbours.

The Oslo process was premised on precisely that formula. Since 1993, Israel had been trying to fulfil that process, until Yasser Arafat walked away from the negotiations at Camp David last summer, throwing the region into chaos and setting back hopes for a "land for peace" arrangement likely for years to come.

The Globe concludes: "The only hope for an end to violence is an agreed separation on negotiated terms." In the best of all worlds that would be true. But what if, as now appears to be the case, the Israelis don't have a negotiating partner? What if, instead of accepting the Mitchell recommendation that halting violence is a necessary first step toward returning to the negotiating table, the Palestinians are committed only to further mayhem? What then? These are the questions that the Globe still needs to address.

Prepared by Paul Michaels of the Canada-Israel Committee.

August 27

• The Israel Defence Forces set up a Patriot anti-missile installation near Haifa. Israel Radio reported that local residents are concerned by reports Hezbollah gunmen in Lebanon possess long-range missiles capable of reaching the Haifa region.

August 28

• Some 81 percent of Palestinians surveyed support suicide bombing attacks against Israelis as long as Israel's measures against Palestinians continue. The survey, also found that 54.8 percent said they still would favour suicide bombings even if Israeli measures cease.

•Israel's high-tech industry took a hit as U.S telecommunications giant Lucent Technologies closed its Israeli unit, Chromatis Networks, which it acquired last year for $4.5 billion.

August 29

• Belgium contacted officials in the United States and Russia to discuss a joint initiative aimed at ending more than 11 months of Israeli-Palestinian violence. Belgium holds the rotating presidency of the European Union until the end of the year.

August 30

• Immigrants from the former Soviet Union make up 13 percent of Israel's population, according to recently released statistics. With 58,000 of the total number of 850,000, Haifa has the largest number, followed by Ashdod and Beersheva.

August 31

• Industry and Trade Minister Dalia Itzik proposed regulations that would prevent the import of cellular phones that do not display the amount of radiation the unit emits. If approved, the regulations would become effective on Jan. 1, 2002.

Arafat will never make peace: Olmert

Earlier in the week, on Monday night, in response to the renewed firing from Beit Jalla upon Gilo, Israel's defence forces moved tanks, armoured personnel carriers and bulldozers into the area surrounding the source of the gunfire from the Arab village. [Ed. note: At press time, the IDF had withdrawn from Beit Jalla.]

Showing visible signs of fatigue, Olmert speculated that the current uncertain political situation with the Palestinians will not change any time soon.

"We are stuck in a very difficult situation that will last for years," he said.

"There may have been a window of opportunity between us and the Palestinians a year ago, but this opportunity was missed by the intransigence of Arafat and has been lost for a very long time."

Nor is the mayor sanguine that a new generation of Palestinian leaders more inclined to making peace with Israel is waiting imminently to take over from Arafat.

"The problem of the Palestinians is, because of the lack of democracy, the nature of their leadership is such that it will not permit compromise soon. It takes time. I have never lost hope, though, that one day there will be a new leadership, a new attitude, a new psychological environment that will permit improved relationships between us and the Palestinians."

The mayor acknowledged what is palpably evident in conversations with most ordinary Israelis: the violence "does have an impact on the mood of the people. It's not easy. This is a war of attrition."

Despite the acknowledgement of this sombreness, Olmert emphasized that "the people of Israel show a great deal of resolve and determination not to be pushed into a black corner, an important sense of confidence that we must remain united and strong."

Speaking about his plans for the capital city, Olmert enumerated four key priorities. His first concern was a demographic one.

"We have to make every effort to increase the number of Jews in the city, especially the young kids who have left in the past," he said.

The mayor's second priority is to achieve an atmosphere of greater tolerance.

"How can we make a society with a greater degree of unity and cohesion but not necessarily without differences? Differences are so very important and we have to respect them.

Exclusive

"Yet, while maintaining this diversity, which is so characteristic of Jerusalem, we have to do a lot more to remove some of the emotional impediments so that there will be an environment of greater tolerance."

Olmert's third priority related to the city's educational system, and his fourth, to its infrastructure. The mayor was quite emphatic about the latter.

"We have to try to improve the infrastructure of all parts of Jerusalem, to improve the quality of life of the Palestinians living here. I want every Palestinian to feel he is equal to every Jew, that he has the same opportunities, the same quality of life, the same municipal services."

"This takes time," the mayor added, "and I [will] move forward."

Of his celebrated row in the summer with the leadership of American Reform Jewry over their decision to cancel all of the movement's summertime youth programs in Israel, Olmert admitted that "the fences have not yet mended."

But he hastened to point out that his anger had been directed at the movement's leadership, not at its membership, with whom he continues to spend his time in Israel.

When asked whether he wished to impart a pre-Rosh Hashanah message to the readers of The CJN, the mayor responded without hesitation.

"These are difficult times; we haven't had such difficulties for many years now. We are resolved, we are determined, we have the inner strength and power to carry on and triumph. But the most important thing we need is the participation, not just the sympathies of world Jewry.

"We need it. They need it. They need it because no single Diaspora Jew will forgive himself if something goes wrong for the State of Israel and he didn't take part in trying to stop it.

"Solidarity expressed by Jews is a source of great encouragement, particularly now because so very few tourists are coming to the city. I think here we have a challenge. We should expect to have more Jews coming to express their solidarity by being here and taking part in efforts on different levels in the life of our city and in the life of our country.

"The more they will do it, the stronger we will be. They will project something not only to us but also the leadership of their countries who will know that Israel is not alone."

Olmert will speak in Toronto on Sunday, Sept. 9 at Beth Sholom Synagogue.

Intifadah comes between Sharon, Peres

By SHELDON KIRSHNER

Israel's current national unity government was established as a direct response to the second Palestinian uprising. But to no one's surprise, the intifadah has become a primary source of tension between Ariel Sharon, the hawkish prime minister who opposed the Oslo process and Shimon Peres, the dovish foreign minister who is trying to salvage it.

Mideast Analysis

Sharon and Peres formed their seemingly improbable partnership in the belief that Israel's perennial dispute with the Palestinians cannot be solved with one sweeping end-of-conflict accord, a goal espoused by Sharon's hapless predecessor, Ehud Barak. Instead, they believe that interim agreements are the best hope for restoring mutual trust and forging a gradual rapprochement.

Sharon and Peres, however, disagree on a number of basic issues, the most preeminent of which turns on the recommendations of the Mitchell report, released on April 30. It calls for an unconditional cessation of violence, cooling-off and confidence-building periods and an eventual resumption of peace negotiations.

Sharon holds that the cooling-off period should kick in only after seven days of complete calm. Peres maintains that this formula needlessly perpetuates the intifadah and gives rejectionist groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad veto power over a possible truce.

Peres' view of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat, and his infrequent meetings with him, have caused stress and strain as well. While Sharon has demonized Arafat and belittled him as a negotiating partner, Peres has described Arafat as the Palestinians' "authentic representative" and claimed that Israel has no choice but to deal with him. The alternatives, he warns, are Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

Sharon, whose alliance with the Labour party is regarded as nothing more than a marriage of convenience, has permitted Peres to discuss only two matters of mutual interest with Arafat and other Palestinian officials: conditions for a ceasefire and the easing of restrictions on Palestinian civilians in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip.

Members of the Likud – and Barak – have vehemently attacked Peres for his efforts to engage Arafat in dialogue. Stung by these rebukes, Peres threatened to resign after meeting Arafat in Lisbon recently.

Sharon and Peres have been at odds over other key issues.

Peres opposed the sudden seizure of Orient House, the Palestinians' unofficial headquarters in Jerusalem, claiming it could retard hopes for resuming contacts with the Palestinian Authority.

Sharon, at first, declared that the takeover was permanent, but after further discussions with Peres, he suggested that it was a temporary measure. (Peres was also a moderating force in persuading Sharon to act with restraint following the June 1 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv).

Neither do Peres and Sharon see eye to eye on settlements in the territories. Peres had to summon up all his influence to persuade Sharon to accept the Mitchell recommendation of a settlement freeze. In addition, Peres was instrumental in coaxing Sharon to remove 15 illegal Jewish encampments in the West Bank. In general, Sharon champions settlements, while Peres questions their intrinsic value.

Apart from these irritants, Peres and Sharon clashed over a proposal, subsequently deferred, to build a ring road around Jerusalem, a plan that would have required the confiscation of more Palestinian land. And they differed over Sharon's decision to demolish 14 Palestinian homes near the Shuafat refugee camp.

Last week, Peres' relationship with Sharon was under additional duress when Sharon reportedly neglected to consult him about two major operations he supposedly opposed: the assassination of Palestinian leader Mustafa Zabri and the army's incursion into Beit Jala.

Peres' entente with Sharon, the object of considerable skepticism and scorn in some Labour party circles, has been shaken.

The question is, can it last much longer amid the bloody chaos and uncertainty of the intifadah?

Canadian, Israeli medical groups to honour cardiologist

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Thousands of cardiovascular patients throughout the world have been given a second chance at life by Dr. Tirone David.

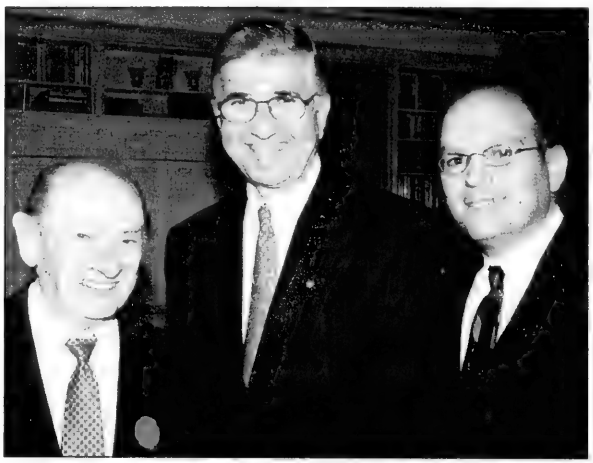
The world-renowned heart surgeon, respected scholar and sought-after lecturer, who has developed numerous operative procedures to treat patients with heart valve disease, complications of myocardial infarction and thoracic aorta aneurysms, will be honoured at a gala dinner on Sept. 11 at the SkyDome.

He will be jointly honoured by the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation and the Toronto and Western Hospital Foundation. The proceeds of the tribute will be shared equally by the heart unit at Toronto General Hospital's Peter Munk Cardiac Centre and the Jesselson Heart Center at Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, an institution with which David has longtime close professional and personal ties.

Pamela Wallin will serve as master of ceremonies. Honorary co-chairs of the tribute are Jackie David, Peter and Melanie Munk and Sandra and Joseph Rotman.

David, an officer of the Order of Canada, heads the Division of Cardiovascular Surgery and is chairholder of the Melanie Munk Chair in Cardiovascular Surgery in the Peter Munk Cardiac Centre of Toronto General Hospital and professor of surgery at the University of Toronto.

Internationally known for his development of the Toronto SPV, a biological heart valve, David spends four months a year travelling around the world to lecture and teach the procedures he has developed.



Dr. Tirone David (centre) is seen at a reception in his honour with Alex Grossman (left), chairman of the board, Canadian Shaarei Zedek Hospital Foundation, and David Smith, nation co-chairman.

Words of praise for David have poured into the organizing committee. Writer Peter Worthington says he is "one of Tirone David's early success stories, dating back to 1978."

"Not only is he the world's greatest heart surgeon, [but] Tirone David is one of the world's great human beings, who, I'm sure every patient feels is a life-long friend," Worthington says.

David's greatest satisfaction is being able to operate on very ill patients whom other surgeons have asked him to take on.

"It is extremely rewarding to watch patients regain their strength and health," he has been quoted as saying. "When it works, the experience is incredible and the feeling of accomplishment is overwhelming."

Despite numerous offers of million-dollar annual contracts in the United States, David remains in Toronto.

David's grandparents immigrated from the Middle East to Brazil, where he and his three brothers and two sisters were born. He was brought up Catholic – his father is Jewish and his mother is Italian – but he remembers his paternal grandparents celebrating the Jewish High Holy Days.

Shaare Zedek Medical Centre, otherwise known as "the hospital with a heart," is a 500-bed acute care hospital in Jerusalem. The Heart Centre occupies the complete 10th floor and provides patients with the most advanced diagnostic and therapeutic techniques available.

The Toronto General Hospital's cardiac program is world famous for its superior patient care, comprehensive teaching and leading-edge research.

For more information on the dinner, or to make a reservation, call 416-340-4800 ext. 6539, or 416-781-3584.

Ryerson grad names her clothing line for her grandma

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

With the school's end of the year fashion show approaching, designer Courtenay Fishman had willed her Bubbie Lil to hold on to life for just a few more days. Fishman, who graduated from Ryerson University's fashion design program last year, had created a clothing line for the show and called it Lily, after her grandmother.

Designs from Fishman's collection were pinned up in her grandmother's hospital room, but her Bubbie Lil died just seven days before the fashion show. She never got to hear how well the show went or how the collection attracted the attention of one of Canada's largest clothing retailers and landed Fishman a dream job designing for the retailer and travelling around the world to look for new trends and fabrics.

"It was really sad," said 23-year-old Fishman recently about her grandmother's death, "but the show went well. I know Bubbie Lil was looking down from somewhere."

When Lily was alive, she had handed down to Fishman clothes she had worn years earlier.

"Bubbie Lil was a fashion-forward lady. She passed down dresses, gloves, purses and scarves that she had worn [in the 1940s]."

It was these clothes that provided Fishman with the inspiration for her collection.

"My line had a modern '40s feeling. I used a lot of bias cuts and chic, iridescent fabrics," says Fishman.

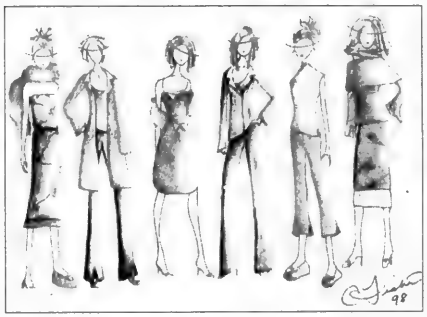
"I wanted my clothes to look feminine, soft, pretty. I was going after the young, fashion-forward market. I designed clothing I would wear but couldn't find on the market."

Fishman says the company who hired her was looking for someone to bring a more sophisticated feeling to the its collection. A smarter, more grown up look was sought, she explains.

Though she wears many of the outfits she designs, she once donned goggles and a ski suit and was on track to become a professional competitive skier.

Born in Edmonton and raised in Calgary, Fishman says she skied competitively for years. She travelled to ski hills in Sweden and Europe and says she raced 120 days out of the year, attending a special high school where she could plow through the material at her own pace.

"Then I just lost interest in skiing and got into art. I love drawing and painting and went into fashion design because it's an industry where you can be creative and still have a job."



Sketches of Courtenay Fishman's line of clothing.

At 18, Fishman moved to Toronto to attend Ryerson's four-year program and she says she was one of the few graduates to be hired right out of the graduating fashion show.

"I'm extremely fortunate to have gotten this job," Fishman admits.

She says it doesn't bother her that customers don't realize she is responsible for designing some of the clothing they wear.

"It's really exciting to see people wearing my clothes. It's surreal."

Fishman has no plans to produce under her own label because she loves what she is doing now.

"You've got to love it because it's a lot of work. You have to have a real inner passion for it and commit yourself because you're always learning."

Fishman's job has sent her to the United States, Europe and the Orient and she'll be leaving for India in August.

Fashion-forward functional clothes

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Since 1998, actors, directors and musicians as well as travellers and people on the go have been shopping at Destination Danforth, a unique store that sells fashion-forward functional clothes.

"The key for us," says store director Sarah Fishman, "is that it's got to have functionality. Everything is machine-washable, breathable, whisks away perspiration and doesn't need to be ironed."

Fishman tries to stock her store with as much Canadian-made product as possible "because I like to support Canada's economy."

With brands like Elita, Mod Robes, Misty Mountain and Columbia, Fishman describes her clothes as "sporty with a flare. They're a good mix of fashion and functionality.

"They're good for people who travel and those who need clothes with minimum fuss."

The idea to open a store that sells functional clothing originated with the clothing shows Fishman and her husband have been putting on at flea markets across south-western Ontario for more than 20 years.

Demand for such clothing "bloomed," and after owning a jeans store for about 11 years, the couple decided to open Destination Danforth, located at Broadview and the Danforth.

Included among those who shop at the store are singer Theresa Tova, Luba Goy of Royal Canadian Air Farce, Jim Cutty from the music group Blue Rodeo, members of the Philosopher Kings and Moxy Früvous – all of whom live in the area.

Actors and film crews love Destination Danforth because they're able to find rainwear and outerwear all year round.

"If it's mid-summer and they're making a film in the Arctic they can get a winter coat here."

Fishman says she sells outwear that's suitable for temperatures from 20 degrees above zero to minus 40.

In addition to outer wear, they sell skirts, jackets that fold into a pocket, polar fleece pyjamas, swim suits, quick-dry shirts, and pants that zip off at the knee to become shorts.

They also sell sleeping bags and collapsible furniture.

And prices are reasonable, Fishman says. "You can come in and buy things for $9.99 if you need a quick gift. The prices aren't intimidating. It's easy to walk in."

Once clients come in, she says, "they always come back."

FOR ALL WALKS OF LIFE

Fall Fashion

A designer and image consultant with a passion for fashion

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

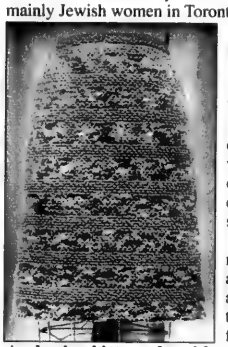
"Those shoes give people the wrong impression about you," says Gladys Eskenazi, when I walk into her Bathurst and Eglinton studio.

"They're too clunky and make a bang-bang noise when you walk. You shouldn't have to make noise to be noticed," the 62-year-old designer and image consultant assures me.

She begins looking through European fashion magazines to show me an example of sandals that would suit me better.

After meeting with her for scarcely a few minutes I was flabbergasted, dumfounded and mystified by her confident and quick assessment of my personality and style.

And I trusted her opinions. After 32 years of catering to mainly Jewish women in Toronto, Uruguayan-born Eskenazi knows what she's talking about.



A classic skirt made with suede and cashmere.

"The most important thing for me is to make each woman beautiful," she says.

Her philosophy is to "bring out the true beauty of each woman [I] work with and to create and integrate the complete and unique personal style she possesses."

Though Eskenazi used to make wedding gowns, coats and dresses, she says she is abandoning her past and throwing all her energy into the future, where she will focus solely on her line of custom-made skirts and on helping her customers choose their accessories.

"I buy the fabrics, I make her the prefect skirt and then I tell her how to accessorize so she gets the perfect look, just for her," Eskenazi says, noting that while it's important to keep abreast of the fashion moods, it's also important to recognize these fads and trends for what they are.

"What's in style depends on the occasion, the time of the event, the type of life [the woman] has and the type of image she wants to project."

That's why Eskenazi shops with her clients, with the objective of buying items that complement the woman, not the moment's fashion. It's also the reason she travels to European fashion capitals every season.

"I highlight a woman's good features and minimize possible problem areas. It's all a matter of balance, proportion and the proper look for each person. If a woman doesn't have the proper look, it's like she's wearing someone else's clothes."

With a reputation for uncompromising quality and workmanship Eskenazi says her prices and policies are surprisingly fair. "I adore big smiles. I give my clients' money back if they aren't happy. It's my policy."

While she says that most designers are smart business people who put lots of money into ads but little effort into creativity, Eskenazi, who attracts clients mainly by word of mouth, says, "I prefer to put my energy into creativity."

And she says all it takes is some creativity to update a suit that is passé. "I can refresh a suit that is passé from the waist down by giving it a new silhouette. [I] think recycling should be applied to fashion. The only limit to recycling is lack of imagination."

Clothes, she reminds women, are an investment, and good-quality items shouldn't be thrown away when the trends change every five years.

With her enthusiasm for the industry, Eskenazi's passion for fashion is clear. "In my curiosity and energy and love for fashion, I think I'm a teenager. I'm proud to work in the service industry."

Lee Graff, camouflage therapist (416-567-skin) at Sunnybrook & Women's Health Science Centre has created a fantastic cover-creme that really works. Cover FX is specifically designed for rosacea, scars, vitiligo, melasma and burns, but this little wonder also erases discoloration and blemishes – a must have for all seasons.

A new make-up and skin care line called Cle de Peau de Beaute from Shiseido is truly for the rich, the famous and fashion divas everywhere. The prices are steep but the quality, packaging and colours are second to none.

Beauty Shop

By Carol Wise

Their intensive skin treatment – very effective and the lipstick feels likes silk – check it all out at a store called Fleuri at the Bayview Village all this October.

Direct from Paris comes a brand new line of skin products from L'Oreal. The name is Kerastase, the gold finishing formulas are so light and invisible that they can be used as hand creams as well. Available this fall at Salon Daniel, 79 Yorkville Ave.

Autumn palettes are decorated with rich shades of navy blue, berry, red and sparkling wine. Sultry, smoky blue eyes will rule. Moist, voluptuous lips will add appeal and certain kissability.

Your skin will soon begin to feel tight so start applying some richly formulated cremes, and for goodness sake don't forget to exfoliate. No point spending a fortune on face and body creams if the barrier of dead cells blocks penetration. Try Kiehls' Pineapple, Papaya Facial scrub, it's very proficient and very yummy. Treat your whole body with Laura Mercier's new bath and body medley including a Honey Bath and a Honey Dipper in the scent of Crème Brulée – what a New Years Gift!

CAROL'S TIPS

Lancôme's new cleansers are available in categories that cover all skin types and are quickly gaining cult colour product duos. New sleek packs and formulas are simply terrific. Absolue also from Lancôme is infused with wild yam, soy and sea algae – a total replenishing experience.

Roche-Posay launches Active C Eyes that promises to reduce signs of aging and dark circles respectively. Elizabeth Arden's Eight Hour Eye Lines Anti-Wrinkle Serum with its skin-strengthening ceramides counteracts the early signs of aging at every stage of a woman's skin – a must have! Turn your bathroom into a spa and watch your skin grow younger with Arden's new Peel and Reveal Revitalizing Mask. It provides cleaning, toning and moisturizing properties to help minimize the appearance of pores and wrinkles.

Clarins introduces Thermal S UV, a daily moisturizer with anti-UV protection. It's a high-performance hydrator containing a SPF 20 filtering system. Soften and minimize lines around the eye area with Shiseido's Bio-Performance Super Eye Contour cream – just kiss those lines away!

Treat your man to a new world of shaving with Kiehl's Close-Shavers Squadron. This I understand is the closest shave in town and while you are at the counter, check out Kiehl's lip balm – superb!

Chanel's Precision line introduces Ultra Correction, an innovative way to correct signs of aging based on an exclusive combination of targeted ingredients and a specific method of self-massage. The gloves and instructions are provided. What a grand gift for the 50ish group.

FOUNDATION: New from Arden, two fabulous liquid makeups in easy to use pump bottles – the names – Radiant Moisture and Bare Perfection. They both contain number 8 SPF, diminish imperfections and give skin a radiant glow.

Christian Dior creates couture eye shadow duos.

Top them up with Arden's Flawless Finish pressed or loose powder.

Biotherm Homme's new Express Bronzer will help you keep your special guy looking healthy in all seasons. Apply it for him. Its fun.

Blanc Universal de Chanel is a light complexion enhancer that is wonderful worn alone or mixed with your favourite foundation. Its provides extra radiance with a youthful glow. Lancaster Suractif Skin Tone promises to help you watch your age spots disappear with a new product called Age Spot Corrector. This gem gives natural coverage that helps conceal existing pigmentation irregularities and limit future ones.

EYES: Ampicils, full-dimension volume mascara from Lancôme is excellent – volume and curls in one swift movement.

Powder eyebrow shadow from Shisiedo's Cle de Peau de Beaute helps emphasize the brow's natural dimension, is easy to apply and looks natural. For extra definition try their eyeliner – fabulous!

Laura Mercier unveils two jewel-toned eye colours inspired by Parisian sunsets and exciting Paris nights. Christian Dior creates couture eye shadow duos, each with its own Dior icon. Printed on a long wearing powder infused with green tea for added anti-oxidant protection. Mac's eye kohl pencil in the colour Powers-that-be is a mid-toned bronzish gold shade that highlights and enlivens the eye area.

CHEEKS: Cheek hue from MAC is simply for the cheeks. "It ain't no blush – its da da delicious," says their top brass. This fusion of art and alchemy results in a cream that dries to a smooth uncreasing powder.

Add just a hint of colour with Laura Mercier's new and dreamy Opera, a soft pink blush for the perfect flush.

Gel Blush from Clinique is another natural cheek lover – just a tint of toasted berries.

L'Oreal's Cheek Shaper blush is pretty in creamy pink or pearlized matte butter. Dust your cheekbones with Crushed Diamonds from Quo's Hot Rocks collection. This fabulous powder reflects light away from fine lines and perks up your complexion.

Isabella Rossellini's Chilled jade 27 is a gorgeous cool tone that adds a pearly touch to cheekbones, eyes and nails. New from Chanel is the Aquablush stick that is perfect for cheeks and can be stroked onto the face for a total healthy glow.

LIPS: Lip Dimension from Lancôme is a mouth-watering delight. It hugs lips with a silky liquid that plays with volume, colours and light. Cargo's celebrity lipsticks are fabulous. My favourite is by Courtney Cox Arquette; the name is Cece – a sheer, iridescent, rich berry.

Moisture Surge Lipstick in Fizzy from Clinique is also stunning as is their Long Last Soft Shine Lipstick in Cherry Cola.

Premier Rouge from Chanel's Star Product collection is an intense red, inspired by the first shade of lipstick created by Mademoiselle Chanel in 1924. It is the red of red and is a limited edition, for fall/winter 2001. Lancaster has a sexy little lip gloss duo that is as natural as the naked lip.

NAILS: L'Oreal Paris has produced an amazing Shock Proof, Extreme Wear Nail Colour. It stands up to wear without chipping!

Take a look at Dior's nail enamel in the colour Whimsical Violet – gorgeous!

NeoStata presents us with a silky nail and hand cream that nourishes our nails and repairs dry rough hands. It's non-greasy and absorbs in seconds.

HAIR: The news from Salon Daniel is all about a natural textured look. Myriad colours combine to create texture and natural looking tresses. However Daniel emphasizes the bottom line is choosing a look that not only suits you best but will enhance the type of hair you have. To avoid dryness, he recommends washing hair twice a week and the other days, just rinse and condition.

Redken's Outshine Anti-Frizz Polishing Milk will bestow a vibrant shine for all hair types.

Shiseido introduces Intensive Hair and Scalp essence. This wonderful treatment works over a four-week period to restore lustre to dry, damaged hair and scalp.

Power Care spray from L'Oreal is another intensive beauty cure that restores health, strength and shine. In seconds your hair will rejuvenate, however, best results after 10-15 applications.

FRAGRANCE: Marian Bendenth, a top fragrance specialist, says the most remarkable thing about fragrances this fall is that they are mostly fresh not cloying. What a blessing, nothing worse than a heavy cloying scent Lancôme Aromafit pampers us with a novel spray of essential oils with natural vegetable extracts and a Whipped Firming Body Cream with a combination of natural extracts of bitter orange and soy protein. Ralph Lauren's Glamorous is all about its name. This extravagant floral scent is as glamorous as the woman who wears it.

Get cozy this season with Elizabeth Arden's Spiced Tea Scent Spray. It's a feel good essence that will intrigue your spirit.

Marc Jacobs Perfume collection launches this fall exclusively at Holt Renfrew. This renowned fashion designer didn't miss a beat with the fragrance or the packaging – very extraordinary! Jacobs captures gardenia at the perfect moment and reflects the fundamental aspects of all his designs – young, fresh, clean and classic.

Dior treats us with perfumed shower gel and body moisturizer in the very sexy scent called Dune.

Dolce and Gabbana's new scent called Light Blue is simply irresistible. It has the sensuality of the Mediterranean.

Bvlgari introduces BLV Pour Homme that pampers our guys with a delicate blend of contrasts that is really very passionate and sexy.

Don't miss Christian Dior's new Men's fragrance, called Higher! It oozes with erotic masculinity. It's available in spray, after shave and shower gel.

Fashion maven Jeanne Beker

By ERIN SILVER
CJN Intern

Growing up, Jeanne Beker's parents told her that the world was her oyster – anything was possible if she worked hard at it.

These words have remained close to Beker throughout her career. She has hiked her way to the pinnacle of success, adding new levels for her to climb and higher peaks for her to reach.

Her career on television began at Citytv in 1979 when Beker, now 49, landed a job co-hosting the ground-breaking, award-winning show, The NewMusic, interviewing rock stars behind the scenes before MTV was born in the United States.

In 1985, she became host of what is now Citytv's most widely syndicated show, FashionTelevision. Beker pioneered in-your-face entertainment reporting prior to the airing of shows like Entertainment Tonight.

Her tell-all autobiography, Jeanne Unbottled: Adventures in High Style, was published in 2000, and in September, she's launching her own line of clothing, with boutiques selling the Jeanne Beker label in Eaton's stores across the country.

"My parents told me never to be afraid and never to give up. They brought me up to have confidence. They always told my sister and I to believe we were were the best and brightest," says Beker.

"Whatever I wanted to do, they encouraged me to do – I took ballet, drama, piano, guitar."

Beker says her work ethic was inspired by her father who, along with Beker's mother, survived the Holocaust. He came to Canada without a penny in his pocket and then went into the "shmatte business," where he ran his own slipper manufacturing company.

"My dad had an amazing work ethic. He was relentless. He worked 12 hour days, seven days a week. He wanted his daughters to go to university. What an inspiration he was."

Today, Beker's hard work has paid off. She has a nice Toronto home, a 123-acre farm outside the city, a countryhouse in Ireland and she and her daughters, aged 14 and 11, go on vacations to exotic destinations.

"My dad never had the chance to enjoy life. It's amazing to think that just one generation removed and [my daughters and I] have such an incredible lifestyle. Every time I go to an exotic location I think of my dad. He would have been so proud."

Though Beker's mother lives to enjoy her daughter's success, Beker's father passed away in 1988, just three years after she began hosting FashionTelevision.

"And to think I'm launching my own clothing line in Eaton's... The whole thing is bashert.

"The biggest deal for my dad was if he got an order from Eaton's. He'd pop open a bottle of Crown Royal. It was the big, glamorous department store.

"I come from a family that's really paid their dues. I hope my kids appreciate the privileged life we live."

But even Beker's life hasn't been all glamour and glitz. Her husband of 12 years left her about four years ago, leaving her a brokenhearted, single working mom.

"I always wanted to please my parents. I felt I disappointed them when my marriage failed. My dad always said life is hard. I didn't realize it until my marriage broke up."

Beker says she was 40-50 pages into writing her book when her husband left. "I thought I could also write about this aspect of my life and add another dimension to my book."

She says she wanted to show that "crappy things happen to all of us. We all have our hearts broken, but we have to pick ourselves up, dust ourselves off and carry on."

Part of the reason she wanted to write the book is because "all we have is each other. I hoped readers could learn from my experience if I shared my perspective on things."

Beker says she got through the divorce by taking things day by day. "You don't ever really recover. You learn to live with it, but the scars never go away. A divorce changes your way of loving and seeing the world. It's like you finally catch your breath, but you don't breathe the same way again."

Beker has since found a new beau – someone she's actually known since childhood – who she's been seeing for the last three years.

"He's very understanding. He's rock solid. We travel a lot together, but we maintain separate lives – I'm not ready to really share my life with someone."

Beker is also involved with many different charities, among them the AIDS Committee of Toronto.

"I do it because I have to put something back into the community. [I love] the spirit of giving – we have to be generous with each other. I feel so privileged that they'd want to associate their event with me."

Beker admits that though her children would like it if she was home more often – and in fact, she sometimes contemplates life after fashion – working is her lifeline, and her daughters and her 80-year-old mother are proud of her for pursuing her passion.

"I love the feeling of being exhausted at the end of the day. When my head hits the pillow, it's a very satisfying feeling to know that I've given it my all."

The secret to doing it all, she says, "is just to love what you do. I just want to make the most of life – grab it and savour it. I feel so privileged. I don't take anything for granted. I'm always so thankful."

Reunion examines Japanese wartime atrocities

By BEN ROSE
Special to CJN

TORONTO — There are parallels between the Holocaust and the atrocities committed by soldiers of the Japanese Imperial Army against Asiatics, including Chinese, a local Chinese doctor believes.

"At first I didn't think the Holocaust message had to be repeated year after year, but now I realize it does," said Dr. Joseph Wong, a general practitioner who has studied the Holocaust for years and was active in bringing Vietnamese boat people to Canada.

As a human rights advocate, he is heading a group bringing Reunion, a Japanese play, to the Leah Posluns Theatre, for the first time in Canada.

Reunion is being sponsored by Toronto Alpha (Association for Learning and Preserving the History of World War II), a Chinese community group.

"It is our method of making a peaceful protest.

"We are inviting Jewish, Chinese, Japanese and other people, to see this play, which is written by Yoshiji Watnabe, the son of a Japanese general, who plays the leading part," said Wong.

For Watnabe, the play is an attempt by him to right the wrongs committed by his father against him and the Chinese people.

"The general abused his children and caused his wife to commit suicide," Wong said. "The son went to Nanking and other places to see the damage his father had done."

Watnabe's wife, Kizuko Yokoi, also plays a major role in Reunion.

In the play, the seven men and three women actors speak only Japanese, but everyone who knows English or Chinese will understand every word through surtitles in both languages, Wong said.

The actors have received death threats in Japan as a result of their hundreds of performances, but no special protection is planned for their Canadian appearance.

There has been little reaction from the Japanese Embassy in Ottawa or the Japanese Consulate in Toronto, Wong said, although Alpha has complained to them about children's textbooks in Japan that obliterate any reference to the crimes committed by Japanese soldiers.

"There is no reference to the scandal of the 'comfort women' provided to Japanese soldiers," Wong said.

"Japan has failed to live up to its responsibility. We did not know at the time we booked Reunion that the Japanese prime minister and several of his cabinet ministers intended to visit the shrine set up to honour the perpetrators. This has certainly attracted a lot of attention."

As an active participant in Holocaust Education Week, Wong said he is convinced the crimes against the Chinese people by Japanese soldiers must have annual international condemnation.

Wong obtained his medical degree at the Albert Einstein College of Yeshiva University in New York, where, he said, learned a lot about Jewish culture from his fellow students.

Tale of doomed ship Struma, one of Jacobovici's best films

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It took one deadly torpedo to sink the decrepit vessel with all hands and passengers aboard.

The Struma, a British yacht in its heyday, sank in the Black Sea in February 1942, drowning 406 men, 269 women and 103 children, the vast majority of whom were Romanian Jews.

The tragedy, a paradigm of Jewish powerlessness and indifference to Jewish suffering during the Holocaust, took place a month after the Nazis, at the infamous Wannsee conference in Berlin, decided to systematically exterminate the Jews of Europe.

Jewish immigrants bound for Palestine.

Since its demise, historians have debated whether it was a German or a Soviet submarine that fired on the Struma, bound for Palestine from the Romanian port of Constanza.

Simcha Jacobovici, a Toronto filmmaker, appears at long last to have solved the mystery in his newest documentary, The Struma. It will be premiered at the Toronto International Film Festival, starting this week.

In The Struma, written and directed by Jacobovici, he tells two parallel tales. The first is about the ship itself. The second is about Greg Buxton, a British diver and the grandson of two of the victims. Animated by reports of a "Jew boat" on the bottom of the Black Sea, he tries to find its watery grave and affix a memorial plaque on its hull.

Jacobovici is not, as he says, a disinterested observer. His parents were Holocaust survivors, and his father was a passenger on the Pan Crescent, a ship with Jewish refugees that set out from Constanza six years later.

In this sense, the making of The Struma turned into a poignant personal odyssey for Jacobovici himself.

Beyond this, The Struma, 92 minutes in length, has all the hallmarks of a Jacobovici investigative documentary. It is thorough. It brims with human passion and political intrigue.

Indeed, The Struma is one of his finest films since Deadly Currents (1991) and Hollywoodism: Jews, Movies & and The American Dream (1998).

The Struma, built in 1867 for a wealthy client, was a rust-bucket when it was chartered by a group of Jews desperate to leave Romania, ruled by an anti-Semitic regime.

Before they embarked in December 1941, Romanian policemen stripped them of almost all their belongings, a fitting prelude for what would be a disastrous journey.

Within hours of leaving Constanza, the vessel's engine broke down. The captain of a passing tugboat demanded a handsome payment in exchange for repairing it.

Several days later, the engine failed again. Turkish tugs towed the Struma into Istanbul, and there it languished for weeks under quarantine, the passengers forbidden to disembark. As conditions deteriorated, the local Jewish community was permitted to send food and supplies.

Turkey's heartless attitude was a function of two factors. Turkey, a neutral, did not want to antagonize Germany by welcoming Jewish refugees. Britain, having restricted Jewish immigration to Palestine to placate the Arabs, exerted equally relentless pressure on Turkey.

Caught between these implacable forces, the Turks caved in. They let in pregnant women and passengers with valid visas, but consigned the rest of the hapless passengers to purgatory.

The Struma was towed to the Bosporus and left to drift into the Black Sea without a functioning engine. The following day, a submarine homed in for the kill.

David Stoliar, the sole survivor, clung to a piece of wood for 24 hours before being rescued by Turkish sailors. Nineteen years old at the time, he recalls the massive explosion, the deafening force that blew him into the sea and the cries and screams from other passengers.

On the basis of interviews with a former British police official based in Palestine and with a historian specializing in espionage, Jacobovici briefly speculates that Britain's MI6 agency may have disabled the Struma.

Having aired this theory, Jacobovici discounts the possibility that a German submarine sank it.

The evidence leads him to the conclusion that the culprit was a Soviet sub. A naval researcher in Latvia explains why the Soviets targeted the Struma. It is a plausible explanation, revolving around a Turkish-German trade agreement, the metal chromium and Joseph Stalin's determination to destroy neutral shipping in the Black Sea. This is fascinating stuff.

In seamless fashion, Jacobovici interweaves the fate of the Struma with Buxton's often frustrating and ultimately futile attempts to locate the torpedoed vessel by using sonar. Buxton's zeal is understandable. The Struma, for him, is emblematic of the unmarked graves of Jews who perished in the Holocaust.

His quest is hampered by exhorbitant demands for money, fierce opposition from a local diving club and Turkish government refusal to cooperate. It sounds as if Turkey has something to hide.

Although Buxton fails to accomplish his mission, his very effort is exhilarating, as is Jacobovici's taut film.

TRAVELLERS STILL GOING STRONG

The subject of a recent National Film Board documentary that was screened at Jewish film festivals in Toronto, Montreal and Vancouver, the modern incarnation of the legendary Canadian folk group The Travellers is preparing to mark its 50th anniversary.

Fronted by Jerry Gray, one of the original Travellers, the band recently kicked off its jubilee year with several performances in and around Toronto, including one at the McMichael Gallery in Kleinberg last Sunday.

Band members are keeping busy. This week they begin work on United We Stand, a new CD of labour songs.

On Oct. 3, Gray begins teaching an 8-week course on Canadian Folk, Protest and Union Songs at the University of Toronto's School of Continuing Studies. The course is essentially "a listen and singalong hootenanny for two hours every week," he says.

The NFB documentary, titled This Land: The Travellers, is scheduled to air on the History Channel in November.

A highlight of the Toronto Jewish Film Festival last spring, the film recaptures the triumph and excitement of the legendary troupe of folk musicians who burst onto the national scene with an irresistible Canadianized version of Woody Guthrie's This Land Is Your Land.

In my opinion, the cut of the film screened in Toronto took a wrong turn by lingering far too long on the band members' painful differences and their eventual split up.

Gray advises that he has "made the NFB aware of a great deal of historical inaccuracies" and that changes to the film are imminent. Whatever shape it's in, it's well worth watching as a great piece of Canadian as well as local Jewish social history.

Book News: Toronto author Michael Kaufman's acclaimed first novel, The Possibility of Dreaming On a Night Without Stars, which recently won a Canadian Jewish Book Award, has gone into second printing.

Penguin Books of Canada decided to bring out the new edition shortly after the awards ceremony last June. Some stores had already begun to remainder unsold copies of the first edition. The new cover is like the old, except that it boasts that the novel is a "Winner of the 2001 Jewish Book Award".

The book, which first gained prominence after a laudatory review in The CJN, is in a "trade paperback" format and costs $22.99.

Filmmaker Heading to Israel: Dara Bratt, a transplanted Montrealer in Toronto, plans to shoot a Jewish-themed documentary film in Israel during Succoth. The film's working title is In So Many Words and its intended subject is the Chevra, the community of Orthodox Jews in Israel that was founded by the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach.

Bratt, a member of the Directors Guild of Canada who has worked professionally as an assistant director, says the intended film "will offer a positive and refreshing portrayal of Jewish life in Israel."

She expects to be with the Chevra with her cameras rolling as they celebrate Succoth, the holiday that marks the time the Jews spent wandering the desert after the Exodus. As in previous years, Chevra members from all over Canada and the United States are expected to join the Chevra in Jerusalem as they transport their couches, beds and tables outside to live under the stars for eight days.

The film is being sponsored by the former Bloor JCC, now called the Miles S. Nadal Jewish Community Center. Bratt has also lined up assistance from the Israeli Ministry of Tourism and El Al Israel Airlines.The National Film Board of Canada and the Independent Liaison of Filmmakers of Toronto have given her grants towards the making of the 30-minute documentary.

Still seeking funds for the project, Bratt advises that the Miles S. Nadal JCC will issue a tax receipt for all donations. For details, contact her at 416-824-3272.

Play examines wartime atrocities

Wong and Prof. Howard Adelman of York University were working independently in helping the boat people of Vietnam. They met by chance and combined their efforts. Adelman, who set up a refugee centre, is supporting the Reunion project.

The play will run Sept. 8, with matinee and evening performances. Wong is also sponsoring a youth forum on the issue from 7 p.m. to 9 p.m. Sept. 10 at Yee Hing Care in Scarborough, a centre for Chinese elderly similar to the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"We learned what to do from Baycrest and its former president, Sam Ruth," Wong said.

The Sept. 8 date is significant, Wong said, because it is the 50th anniversary of the signing of the San Francisco peace treaty between Japan and the Allies, to mark the formal cessation of hostilities in Asia-Pacific between Japan and the rest of the signatories.

The production, which runs two hours and 15 minutes, does not feature violence, and in Wong's words, "is a touching play." Admission is $10 for young people, students and seniors, and $20 for adults.

Decades ago, singer-songwriter Carole King asked the musical question, "Doesn't anybody stay in one place any more?" The question has never seemed so relevant as in this age of jumbo jets, when everyone seems to be on the go. Herewith, a select list of activities, alphabetical by city, for CJN readers to enjoy in their travels.

Berlin: Nearly 4,000 objects reflecting two millennia of Jewish life in Germany go on view when the first exhibition in Berlin's Jewish Museum opens on Sept. 11. Although hundreds of thousands of visitors have already toured architect Daniel Libeskind's distinctive angular building, which opened in 1999, now they may learn something of the country's Jewish history as well.

According to the Jewish Telegraphic Agency, a multi-media presentation in the Museum provides a virtual glimpse of everyday Jewish life in medieval Worms, where the great 11th century Jewish philosopher Rashi studied. The Museum also features a Gallery of the Missing which focuses on the Holocaust, and another section dealing with the renewal of Jewish life since the Holocaust.

Business Profile

Family firm demolishes buildings in the name of progress

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

As Ira Greenspoon and his associates are apt to say, they clear the way for progress.

His third-generation family firm, Greenspoon Brothers Ltd., is Canada's busiest demolition and dismantling contractor.

Last year, the company did $25 to $30 million worth of business.

In a normal season, Greenspoon Brothers, headquartered in Brampton, Ont., tears down 150 buildings across North America, from graphite and glass manufacturing plants to high schools and office buildings.

What goes up must come down.

The company, founded by his grandfather as a salvage operation, usually demolishes industrial, commercial and institutional structures.

Greenspoon Brothers was started by a Polish immigrant in the 1930s

It rarely tears down residential homes. "Our area of expertise is larger projects," said Ira, a genial, beefy man who resembles an ex-football player.

"Generally, we do houses of people we know."

Run today by Ira and his cousins, Marty and Paul, Greenspoon Brothers has been involved in some of Toronto's biggest demolition projects, having paved the way for such contemporary landmarks as Toronto City Hall, Sky Dome and the Toronto-Dominion Centre.

In the process, the company, which also salvages and sells furnishings from job sites, wrecked the old Toronto Dominion Bank, the Canadian National Railways round house and Shea's Hippodrome (a vaudeville and movie theatre).

At the moment, it is demolishing an office building in Hamilton, an oil refinery in British Columbia and a high school in Sault St. Marie.

It is also gutting the interior of the Erin Mills Town Centre in Mississauga and the Royal Victoria Hospital in Barrie, and removing asbestos from Toronto's former city hall.

A while ago, Greenspoon Brothers demolished the old Associated Hebrew School at Bathurst and Neptune, an institution Ira once attended.

Facetiously, he described the job as "every wrecker's dream."

Its toughest project was in 1986. "We tore out the 1.9 million-square-foot assembly line of General Motors' truck plant in Oshawa," said Ira, senior vice-president in charge of finance.

"We had to do it in nine days after the plant shut down, but nine months of pre-planning were required," he explained in a recent interview.

Apart from safety and staffing issues, the Greenspoons had to resolve matters like demolition methods and equipment requirements.

One of its most time-consuming contracts, the teardown of an oil refinery in British Columbia, is nearing completion.

It will have taken almost two years to demolish.

He cannot always calculate the duration of a project. "There's no rule of thumb as to the length of demolishing a building."

Currently, Greenspoon Brothers is bidding for what he called "the mother of all jobs," the imminent demolition of Terminal One at Pearson Airport in 2003, a $5-million contract that has yet to be awarded.

He stands a good chance of snagging the contract, if only because Greenspoon Brothers tore down the airport's former air traffic control tower and has a fine track record.

Benjamin, his grandfather, founded the company in Sudbury, Ont., in the late 1930s after having earned a living as a junkyard operator.

A Polish Jew, he arrived in Canada at the turn of the 20th century, after deserting from the imperial Russian army. He died in the late 1970s.

Benjamin's sons, Irving, Moe, Bill and Max (Ira's father), moved the business to Toronto in the early 1950s and expanded it.

Ira, who had been a public accountant for 16 years, came aboard in 1985.

"I joined at a time when it needed more input from the next generation," said Ira, who might have been a dentist had the University of Toronto accepted his application.

"I had reached the point where I knew I didn't want to spend the rest of my life in accounting," he added. "I was a bit bored with accounting. I had the feeling I wanted to be involved hands-on in running a business."

He was not a complete stranger to its inner workings, having done some of its accountancy work.

Sixteen years on, he has no regrets. As he put it, "It's a fascinating and unusual business."

And it certainly has changed considerably since he was a student.

Fifty years ago, manual labourers, rather than heavy-duty machines, were the nuts and bolts of demolitions.

And while Greenspoon Brothers once took on two to three jobs simultaneously, it now handles 15 to 20, mostly in the Golden Horseshoe region of Ontario's heartland.

Notable among its jobs were the demolition of Exhibition Stadium, the former home of the Toronto Argonaut football club, and of the Johns Manville factory.

Greenspoon Brothers, which moved to Brampton in 1987, employs a permanent work force of 120, plus some 80 part-timers.

Ira's wife Merle is also an employee. "She's my boss," he quipped.

In general, large structural jobs require about 20 men, interior guttings require 60 to 70 and asbestos removals as many as 100.

During the 1970s, the company invested heavily in new equipment after major manufactuers began adding specialty attachments (buckets, grapples, hydraulic hammers and shears) to excavators.

In addition to its excavators, Greenspoon Brothers can call upon the services of backhoes, front-end loaders, truck-mounted cranes and a fleet of vehicles, including Mack trucks.

He professes to be unconcerned by the expectation that none of his children will join Greenspoon Brothers. Darren is a high school math teacher and Elisse and Marni are students.

"There won't be a fourth generation of Greenspoons in the business," he said matter-of-factly.

"We're grooming a team of middle managers who will take over the company. That's our biggest challenge."

Fleisher finishes third at senior championship

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

MISSISSAUGA, Ont. — There's something about the sound of a well-struck golf ball – the swoosh of the club, the snap of the ball and the sight of the rising white projectile arching upward and away, heading down range and plopping down in the middle of the fairway.

Golf fans, not content to see their senior heroes smack the ball through 18 holes at the AT&T Canada Senior Open, wandered over to the driving range at the Mississauga Golf & Country Club to watch the pros wind down after a round by practicing with a bucket of balls.

One of the biggest crowds gathered behind Bruce Fleisher, the lanky Florida native who's best known for his remarkable success on the senior circuit after a mediocre career on the PGA Tour.

Fleisher was never known as a big hitter. Accuracy and a deadly short game were his greatest strengths, and when he unleashes his 6'3", 205-lb frame with a smooth, unhurried tempo, he drives the ball only 270 yards. Pretty good for a weekend golfer – and good enough to draw spectators' admiration – but with a 268.3 yard average, he ranks 56th in driving distance on the Senior Tour.

His short game is much better, and Fleisher relied on that part of his arsenal to register a 14-under par 270 at the Open. He returned home to Ballen Isles, Fla. with a cheque for $115,200, bringing his 2001 money winnings to $2,175,182,tops on the Tour (all figures are in U.S dollars).

Through four days on the 6,773-yard, par 71 course, Fleisher consistently kept the ball in play, giving himself the chance to make birdies. Unfortunately, his putter refused to cooperate, and he all too frequently left birdie putts agonizingly close to the cup, including a makeable putt for eagle on the last day. The misses proved costly as he finished the tournament one stroke behind the leaders, Walter Hall and Ed Dougherty. Hall won the championship in a playoff.

For Hall, a former appliance salesman who turned pro at 47, the Canada Open was his first-ever tour win. Fleisher, another golfer who found success late in his career, has won three times in 2001 and 14 times since he joined the Tour three years ago. His cumulative money winnings are over $7 million.

A former U.S. amateur champ (1971), Fleisher won only one PGA event, the New England Classic, in 1991. He had other wins, including the Brazilian Open, the Jamaican Open and the Bahamas Open, all in 1990, but his PGA career was marked by more downs than ups. From the mid- to late 1980s, he left the tour to make a living as a club pro at Williams Lake Country Club in North Miami Beach and in 1989, he won the PGA Club Pro Championship.

In his mid- to late 40s, he was back on the PGA Tour, but enjoyed only modest success. During the Canadian Open at Glen Abbey around five years ago, he told The CJN he was already looking forward to turning 50 and joining the Senior Tour.

Since joining the Tour, he's been on fire. In his first season, he won his first two events (becoming the first golfer to do so), was top money winner ($2,515,705) for the year, was named Player of the Year, Rookie of the Year and was recipient of the Byron Nelson Trophy for lowest scoring average (69.19).

He has consistently registered among the best accuracy statistics on the Tour. This year, he's third in driving accuracy (80.3 percent), second in hitting greens in regulation (72.6 percent) and third in putting average (1.733). In 2000, he was sixth in putting average (1.743) and in 1999, he was first (1.728).

"In the last couple of years, I haven't putted that well," Fleisher acknowledged after one of his rounds. "In the first year, I putted really well. Maybe I'm trying too hard."

Fleisher's explanation for his senior success probably doesn't give himself enough credit for consistently shooting below par.

"My timing was right," he said. "I came into it at a good time. The good guys were getting older and there weren't too many good young players."

Perhaps his competitive spirit has reached new levels of intensity as well. Years ago, as one of the older players on the PGA Tour, he said he looked forward to the more relaxed atmosphere of playing with seniors – golfers who were closer to his own age.

In Mississauga, he bristled at the notion of camaraderie among golfers. It appears the thought of it has triggered a sore spot. "I don't want it, I don't need it," he said. "We are out on the edge here. I'm here to win, not be a nice guy. I was a nice guy for a lot of years, and what did it get me?"

Has his unprecedented success fueled resentment or jealousy among other golfers? Does the fact he is Jewish play a part in that?

"You don't want to go there," he said, as he declined to elaborate.

Not exactly an admission, but not a denial either.

Fleisher has been proud to identify as a Jew in a sport with virtually no Jews at the highest levels (Skip Kendall is the only Jewish PGA Tour player). His official bio at the PGA Web site points out he won a gold medal at the 1969 Maccabiah Games in Israel and he coached the U.S. golf team at the 1989 Games. He continues to support the Maccabi movement and helped raise funds for the 2001 team.

Following the Senior Open, Fleisher took some time off and returned home for the first time in three months. He's played lots of golf this year, but with the kind of paycheques he's been earning, you can expect to see Fleisher battling for more wins on the Senior Tour.

Israeli boots Turks past Scots

CJN News Services

ISTANBUL — Israeli international soccer star Haim Revivo scored the first goal in Turkey Fenerbahce's 2-1 victory last week over Scottish champion Glasgow Rangers in an exciting clash that helps the Turkish titleists qualify for the Champions League. The first leg of the competition ended 0-0 in Glasgow.

Revivo's free-kick in the fourth minute from outside the box curled wickedly to beat Rangers keeper Stefan Klos.

The victory saw Revivo become the first Israeli player to take part in the final stages of the Champions League. He is captain of Fenerbahce.

Our responsibilities

Straight from the heart

By AVRUM ROSENSWEIG

Recently a friend told me she was grateful to God for the hot water that came from her showerhead that morning. She had just returned from weeks of relief work in South America, where her host village's water supply was contingent upon the frequency of rainfall; the collection of it depended on who would fix the hole in the vat. She felt fortunate to have been born in a northern land of plenty, knowing the meagerness of the lands in the south.

We are indeed blessed to live in a bountiful place at an astounding time in history. Often I'll celebrate my fortune by shouting aloud in my head, "I am a free man, enslaved by nobody. I'm a prosperous man able to buy the ripest tomatoes my palate desires. As a Jew I am able to educate myself where and how I like, and to hang a mezuzah on my doorpost, safe of hooligans."

Baruch ata HaShem, blessed are You – thank You for creating me in this city, in a place like Oz.

Yet along with my happiness comes a certain "double-think." I've become more aware over time that while I have a fair portion of the world's booty, including material things and friendship, my neighbour along Bathurst Street is a poor Jewish senior, reliant on a few moments a week from the Meals on Wheels volunteer for her companionship.

I'm more conscious of the freedom that allows me to partake in a Second Cup philosophical debate (unconcerned with the orphaned briefcase sitting in the corner), while in Israel, Jews have been inducted into a pizza-parlor battleground, defending our right to exist. Their costs are gargantuan. There seems to be a great disparity between many aspects of my life and theirs.

Becoming more conscious of my gifts also encouraged me to reflect upon my responsibilities to others. Perhaps I should consider a life of minimalism? This contemplation is fleeting however, as I am easily seduced by a fascinating biography at Indigo. Thankfully, Judaism's disdain of a self-imposed Nazarene existence seems rational. After all, denying myself worldly goods would not provide others with more.

Finding the balance is the challenge; however, I do believe that along with the glory of having a great measure of free will and a relative lavishness comes a prerequisite to use it to lend a hand to those who are without.

As the High Holy Days approach, I have created a one-pager, which I will use during my days of introspection and atonement. On one side of the page, I listed my bountiful gifts. On the other side, I listed examples of hardship in the world, like those Jews and non-Jews knotted in a society of devout bigotry, the billions of people lacking potable water and the Palestinian children who wade through sewage to arrive at their refugee camp schoolhouse.

As yom tov gets closer, I rework my one-pager, adding and deleting items, ultimately creating a picture of myself within the world.

I'm so grateful to be a Jew in Canada today. I am embracing of the Fiddlerian toast, "To life," yet I'm also attempting to develop an empathy and discipline to share with those who cannot luxuriate in their own worldly share.

Thucydides said, "But the bravest are surely those who have the clearest vision of what is before them, glory and danger alike, and yet notwithstanding go out and meet it."

Have a peaceful and challenging yom tov.

About Life

Dear Ella,

Our family spends every yontif at my sister-in-law's home. Her 83-year-old mother, who has been widowed and living alone for the past 14 years, spends every holiday there too. I would like to have everyone over to my home once in a while for a Jewish holiday, but her mother is kosher and doesn't feel comfortable eating in my house. As far as I'm concerned, my home is no less kosher than my sister-in-law's. My husband won't get involved either, even though it's his family. As it stands, now I usually make a couple of dishes and take them over. Everyone enjoys them except for her mother.

I'm beginging to feel very insulted and feel like making our own holiday without the rest of the extended family. What do you think?

Kosher Clashes

Dear Kosher Clashes

Things often get sticky when family is involved. It's like walking a tightrope to make everyone happy, and inevitably, someone always ends up compromising to keep the peace.

I do understand where you're coming from. It's always nice to make yontif with the whole family in your home. The warmth and smells in a home where a family is about to sit down to a holiday meal creates a very special atmosphere and a memory that stays with you forever.

You are not going to change the mother's kashrut ideals at this point. She is set in her ways and beliefs, and for whatever reason, she feels more comfortable at her daughter's home. I don't think the answer is to try to change her at this point, however, you have to do what you feel is right for you and your family. Maybe you could spend Rosh Hashanah with your in-laws and then break the fast with your family at your home, or possibly take one year off every once in a while and enjoy the holidays with your family alone.

I give you a lot of credit for being the one who has compromised. It shows respect and love, and in the end, isn't that what it's all about?

Should Canadian Women Continue With Breast Self-Examination?

A recent article in the Canadian Medical Association Journal has sparked controversy and brought confusion to the value of women being taught breast self-examination to screen for breast cancer. Dr. Pamela Goodwin, Director of the Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital and a Senior Scientist with the Samuel Lunenfeld Research Institute was asked to bring some clarity to these findings and their impact on breast health.

Q. In light of this study, what breast health screening procedures do you recommend women follow?

A. Mammography for all women over 50 every one to two years. Mammography possibly for women 40 to 49 years. This should be discussed with your doctor. Mammography for younger women if there is a family history of breast cancer. Clinical breast exams for all women on an annual basis. Breast self-examination is a personal choice – one that should be made based on knowing the risks and benefits, and knowing how to do it properly.

Q. Does this mean that women should abandon BSE altogether?

A. This does not close the door on BSE. It just places it in perspective and reinforces the importance of proven screening techniques. It does not mean that women who currently perform BSE should stop. Nor does it mean that women should not be aware of their breasts and report any changes or lumps to their doctors. It simply means that women should not feel obligated to perform a detailed monthly BSE.

Q. Where can I get more information on Breast Health and the screening procedures available to me?

A. The Marvelle Koffler Breast Centre at Mount Sinai Hospital offers a free program that teaches women about breast health, breast cancer risk factors and lifestyle choices to promote breast health. Called the AstraZeneca Breast Health Program, it gives women an opportunity to learn about the pros and cons of BSE and for those women who decide to do it, the program teaches them how using "life-like" breast models. The program also helps women formulate a plan of action for dealing with lumps in case they find one.

Q. Dr. Goodwin, what was your reaction to the recent report questioning the value of self-breast examinations?

A. What the report says is that there is no clear evidence that Breast Self-Examination (BSE) increases your survival rate and in fact it may cause harm to some women through emotional distress and biopsies. As a result, the researchers say that it is not necessary to tell women to routinely practice breast self-examination. However, if women choose to do so, they should be taught how to do BSE properly. We agree with this. The report also reinforces the importance of women following proven screening procedures – clinical breast exams for all women and mammography for women over 50 years of age.

UJA FEDERATION

ראש הממשלה
Prime Minister

August 5, 2001
ט"ז אב, תשס"א

Dear Friends,

These are difficult days for Israel. Our defense and security expenses are escalating and our economy is severely challenged by the present situation.

Government Ministries, except for those involved in matters relating to national security, are facing serious budgetary restrictions as a consequence of our necessity to earmark emergency funds for defense purposes. These spending constraints may unfortunately affect many social services and programs.

As a result, the Government of Israel has issued an urgent appeal for Jewish Federations across North America, including the UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, to reduce the impact of these spending cuts through enhanced annual campaigns. By contributing to the UJA Federation campaign, you will be supporting Israel in a time of crisis.

The Jewish community of Toronto is respected around the world for its devotion to Israel and its sense of responsibility for all Jews in need. We, in Israel, recognize this remarkable characteristic of your community. We know that we can count on you to help us meet our current challenges.

The Jewish people are resilient and determined. With your help, we will emerge from these difficult times stronger than ever before.

Thank you for your solidarity.
Shana Tova to you and your loved ones.

Sincerely,

Ariel Sharon

Israel is Calling. It's time to Answer.

As outlined by Prime Minister Sharon, Israel is seeking support from the entire worldwide Jewish community. With nearly $700 million U.S. transferred from vital services to help pay for security needs, the people of Israel who rely on these services are left especially vulnerable.

Therefore, Israel has asked us to step forward to ensure the continued availability of crucial social, educational and health programs during this critical time.

Increased gifts to UJA Federation Campaign 2002 will help those hardest hit by the government's transfer of funds. It's one of the most effective ways to answer Israel's call. And with this year's Challenge Fund matching gift increases dollar for dollar, your support has much more impact.

The people of Israel are facing enormous pressures during these difficult days. It's time to ease their burden.
It's time to answer the call.

THE CHALLENGE FUND

Your gift goes farther on Israel's behalf

This year, the UJA Federation Challenge Fund will help your gift multiply to benefit the people of Israel. The Challenge Fund, established through the heartfelt generosity of caring, concerned families from our community, will match every gift increase dollar for dollar. That way your additional UJA Federation donation will double to provide essential programs for those hardest hit by the current crisis. So please give generously to help Israel during these critical times.

Editorial

Rosh Hashanah is about life. The poignancy of life, its precious and precarious nature suffuses the holiday and its liturgy. We start the new year by confronting our own mortality. "Zochreinu l'chaim," we plead with God. "Remember us for life." As we complete the entreaty, its personal relevance climbs in urgency. Some of us even hold our breath for a moment when we think of the implications of our prayers. "Remember us for life, O King who cherishes life; and inscribe our names in the book of life; for your sake, God, life."

Our cry to God is that He ensure we make it through another year. Ironically, many of us forget that our cri de coeur is the inverse of God's plea to us – through the voice of Moshe – in the preceding week's Torah portion (Nitzavim): "Uvacharta b'chaim lma'an tichyeh atah v'zarecha." ("Choose life, so that you and your descendants will live"). Our yearning to live must be proved deserving by our courage and our wisdom to choose life.

Shanah Tovah from everyone at The CJN!

We have one heritage and one destiny

Moshe Katsav, President of the State of Israel

Dear Friends,

In the Jewish tradition, the High Holy Days are also a time for national soul searching. The past year was one of challenge to the Jewish people. It was a year in which, hourly, we had to prove our national strength, our unity and our bond to our country – our homeland. Terrorism afflicted us indiscriminately and aimed at defeating Israel for political benefits. The terrorism experienced during the past year has been the most difficult and cruel ever encountered and it brought back forgotten images.

Despite the difficulties, Israel has not ceased aiming for peace and fulfilling its obligation to defend its citizens.

The people of Israel derive encouragement from the solidarity missions arriving from the Diaspora. The solidarity rallies with Israel taking place throughout the world symbolize the special attachment of the Jewish people with our homeland. Your continued efforts are important and unify us.

Dear friends, despite the difficulties and concerns, we must remember the historical achievements of the people of Israel: The eight-fold increase of the Jewish population in Israel from 600,000 to five million, including the immigration and absorption of the Holocaust survivors from Europe, the Jews from Islamic countries, from the former Soviet Union and Ethiopia; the revival of the Hebrew language; technological achievements; a modern democratic country; building an Israeli society and culture common to Jews who have come here from 102 countries and speak 82 languages.

Especially at this time, we are duty-bound to increase the attachment to the State of Israel and to deepen the Jewish education and Zionist heritage amongst us. I call on the Jewish communities in the world to visit Israel and to place the issue of aliyah on their agenda. We are one people, we have one heritage and one destiny.

On the eve of the new year, I convey to you and to your families my best wishes for a Happy New Year, a year of ingathering of the exiles, a year of peace and security. We all hope and pray for better days for the Jewish people.

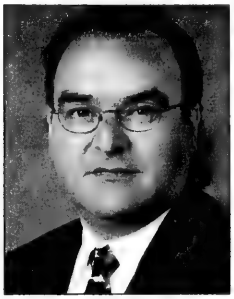
Shana Tova!

This year in Jerusalem

Keith Landy, National President, CJC

At this time of spiritual renewal, all of us have the chance to reflect on the year that has gone by and to renew our commitment to a better future.

This year, it is especially important for us to replenish our resources from the wellsprings of our tradition and our faith. We have lived through a momentous and difficult year for the Jewish people.



Whatever our individual and communal achievements, we have all become aware of the increasing hostility to Jews in many countries around the world and the threat to Israel's existence.

In Durban, South Africa, at the International Conference of Non-Governmental Organizations prior to the UN's so-called World Conference Against Racism, I was exposed first-hand to the virulent hatred Israelis and Jews in other countries must face on a daily basis.

The courage and resilience of ordinary Israelis who must deal with the constant threat of violence are an inspiration to all of us in our ongoing struggle against the scourge of anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism, even here in Canada. They must have – they deserve – our unstinting support.

We are called upon to work together, as a united people, with courage and determination. In answer to the attempt to deny our rights and our existence in Israel, we respond not with, "Next year in Jerusalem," but "this year." To those who seek to weaken our resolve, we answer, "HaShem will give strength to His people and [in this way] HaShem will bless His people with peace."

Let us work for the unity and unwavering commitment of the Jewish people to survive and prevail. May the new year bring each of us health and peace to Israel and all the nations. "Chazak, chazak venitchazak b'od ameinu."

Canada 'disassociates' itself from final WCAR text

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

Canada stayed in Durban until the bitter end, and signed the final declaration of the tumultuous World Conference Against Racism (WCAR), but reserved its harshest words for the section of the text that deals with Israel and the Middle East.

Despite Canada's attempt to distance itself from controversial language on Israel and Palestinians, Canadian Jewish Congress denounced the final declaration, calling it "tainted."

Working non-stop for nearly 24 hours after the conference was supposed to end last Friday, the 153 nations in attendance hammered out a declaration recognizing the injustice of slavery and colonialism, and referring only to the "plight" of Palestinians.

But Canadian delegation head Hedy Fry issued a "statement of reservation" immediately after the agreement was announced, saying Canada wished to "disassociate" itself from those parts of the text dealing with the Middle East.

"We are not satisfied with this conference," Fry said in remarks directed at the conference chair. "Canada is still here today only because we wanted to have our voice decry the attempts at this conference to delegitimize the state of Israel, and to dishonour the history and suffering of the Jewish people.

"We believe, and we have said in the clearest possible terms, that it was inappropriate... to address the Palestinian-Israeli conflict in this forum. That is why the Canadian delegation registers its strongest objections and disassociates itself integrally from all text in this document directly or indirectly relating to the situation in the Middle East.

"We state emphatically," said Fry, "that this text is ultra vires; it is outside the jurisdiction and mandate of this conference."

Added delegate Paul Heinbecker, Canada's ambassador to the UN, "Too much time has been spent on an issue which does not belong here. We want to condemn at this conference the attempts to delegitimize the state of Israel."

The Middle East and charges of anti-Semitism took up a good portion of the conference's time, resulting in nine days of brinksmanship, recrimination and the quitting of the meeting by Israel and the United States. Western delegates feared a final declaration would condemn Israel for its treatment of Palestinians. But the text does not specifically criticize Israel or mention Zionism.

Canada was under pressure from Jewish groups to quit the conference when anti-Zionist rhetoric and language appropriating Holocaust imagery to describe treatment of Palestinians reached its apex. But Ottawa, Fry told Canadian Press, made the right decision by staying.

"I think there was a great deal of value in our staying," Fry told CP shortly after she bluntly expressed displeasure at aspects of the conference that dealt with the Mideast.

"We didn't achieve everything [on Canada's agenda], but we felt if we were not there, we would not have been able to influ-

CJC president says outcome of anti-racism conference ironic

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It is a cruel irony that the World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) in Durban, South Africa, has become a global forum for promoting racism, says Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Landy spoke last week via telephone from Israel to a CJC, Ontario region press conference moderated by Ed Morgan, president of the CJC Ontario region.

Ed Morgan

Also speaking was Manuel Prutschi, CJC national community relations director, who was still in Durban.

"The conference, which was an opportunity to combat the scourges of racism, racial intolerance, xenophobia and discrimination around the world, is an unmitigated failure and a complete fiasco," Landy said.

The UN conference has been "hijacked by states and groups with narrow political agendas, and Israel has been singled out and vilified by countries which by any objective standards are among the worst human rights abusers in the world," he said.

To be logically consistent with the approach that our government took from the start with respect to the WCAR, he said, it is appropriate that the Canadian delegates should now come home.

Manuel Prutschi

"[Multiculturalism Minister Hedy] Fry has indicated clearly that offensive language must be removed from [draft documents produced at the conference], and we commend the government for its strong declaration that it does not and will not stand for this language.

"The government has indicated, however, that it will hang on to see if it can remove the offensive language. While we believe in miracles, we cannot count on them. Therefore, the government must leave the conference immediately and come home," Landy said.

The theme of the conference is equality, justice and dignity for all, he said, "but it appears that for all means for everyone but Jews."

He had met with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres, that day, he said, and Peres said he urged Canada to join those delegations that had already left Durban.

At the NGO forum against racism, which preceded the WCAR, said Prutschi, the "issue of the Middle East was totally pervasive. It was the central motif throughout the conference, so that no matter what forum, no matter what workshop was taking place, somehow the Palestinian issue intruded. At the same time, we as a Jewish caucus were shouted down and booed whenever we attended such forums."

The final plenum of the NGO forum was a "complete shambles. There was no systematic process and no rules were followed. By the time the final draft was declared only a fraction of the delegates were present.

"No one knows if there was a vote at all, because the document has not been produced."

He said that at the time he spoke, the draft document of the government conference still contained odious language, "and its intention is to essentially dismantle the State of Israel.

"Our view is that we have no confidence that this language is going to be removed and that is why we have been calling on Canada to leave, so as not to give any further credibility to this conference," said Prutschi.

He said that Canada, along with a number of other governments including those of Australia, Norway and South Africa, was coming up with a draft document that would completely and totally have the odious language removed.

The European Union had alerted the Arab states, he said, that if the EU did not see any progress towards the removal of this language then the EU would certainly be assessing its situation very seriously.

The international Jewish caucus made up of various Jewish organizations across the world had walked out of the conference, so there was no longer an official Jewish presence, he said, but simply a number of people of no official status who "decided to remain to monitor developments."

Prutschi said that some of the major human rights organizations "have been cowardly in how they have dealt with the whole process. They have indicated that they cannot endorse the document because they disagree with some elements in the language, but they have not come out in a vigorous way and condemned what is going on here.

"An anti-racist conference has turned into a conference that is anti-Semitic and [the human rights organizations] have not expressed themselves on that.

"They have not had the guts to put the onus on those who have chosen to make the Palestinian issue and the attack on Israel the central motif of the conference."

Durban Aftermath

Excerpts from racism conference's final declaration

The following are selected paragraphs, under the heading "Middle East," from the final declaration adopted Sept. 8 by the United Nations World Conference Against Racism, held in Durban:

• We recall that the Holocaust must never be forgotten.

• We also recognize with deep concern the increase in anti-Semitism and Islamophobia in various part of the world, as well as the emergence of racial and violent movements based on racism and discriminatory ideas against Jewish, Muslim and Arab communities.

• We are concerned about the plight of the Palestinian people under foreign occupation. We recognize the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to the establishment of an independent state and we recognize the right to security for all states in the region, including Israel, and call upon all states to support the peace process and bring it to an early conclusion.

'We are concerned about the plight of the Palestinian people under foreign occupation'

• We recognize the right of the refugees to return voluntarily to their homes and properties in dignity and safety, and urge all states to facilitate such return.

The following are excerpts from the final declaration adopted by Non-Governmental Organizations (NGOs) at the World Conference Against Racism:

• We declare Israel as a racist, Apartheid state in which Israel's brand of Apartheid as a crime against humanity has been characterized by separation and segregation, dispossession, restricted land access, denationalization, "bantustanization" and inhumane acts.

• [We are] appalled by the inhumane acts perpetrated in the maintenance of this new form of Apartheid regime through the Israeli state war on civilians including military attacks, torture, arbitrary arrests and detention, the imposition of severe restrictions on movement (curfews, imprisonment and besiegement of towns and villages), and systematic collective punishment, including economic strangulation and deliberate impoverishment, denial of the right to food and water, the right to an adequate standard of living, the right to housing, the right to education and the right to work.

• We recognize that targeted victims of Israel's brand of Apartheid and ethnic cleansing methods have been in particular children, women and refugees and condemn the disproportionate numbers of children and women killed and injured in military shooting and bombing attacks.

• [We] recognize the right of return of refugees and internally displaced people to their homes of origin, restitution of properties, and compensation for damages, losses and other crimes committed against them, as guaranteed in international law.

• [We are] appalled by the discrimination against the Palestinians inside Israel which include: The imposition of discriminatory laws, including the discriminatory laws of return and citizenship, which emphasize the ethnicity of the Israeli state as a Jewish state; the granting of benefits or privileges solely to the Jewish Israeli citizens; the imposition of restrictions on the civil and political rights of Palestinians because of their national belonging or because they do not belong to the majority ethnic group; the negation of the right of Palestinians to equal access to resources of the state and civil equality, including affirmative action policies, which recognize the historical discrimination against Palestinians inside Israel.

• [We] call for an increased awareness of the root causes of Israel's belligerent occupation and systematic human rights violations as a racist, Apartheid system, through relevant UN agencies working closely with international civil society networks to widely disseminate information including educational packs for schools and universities, films and publications.

• [We] call for the establishment of a UN Special Committee on Apartheid and Other Racist Crimes Against Humanity perpetrated by the Israeli Apartheid regime to monitor and to report Apartheid and other racist crimes, and to recommend the implementation of measures to combat Apartheid and other racist crimes.

• [We] call for the launch of an international anti Israeli Apartheid movement as implemented against South African Apartheid through a global solidarity campaign network of international civil society, UN bodies and agencies, business communities and to end the conspiracy of silence among states, particularly the European Union and the United States.

• [We] call upon the international community to impose a policy of complete and total isolation of Israel as an Apartheid state as in the case of South Africa which means the imposition of mandatory and comprehensive sanctions and embargoes, the full cessation of all links (diplomatic, economic, social, aid, military cooperation and training) between all states and Israel. [We] call upon the Government of South Africa to take the lead in this policy of isolation, bearing in mind its own historical success in countering the undermining policy of "constructive engagement" with its own past Apartheid regime.

• [We call for the] condemnation of those states who are supporting, aiding and abetting the Israeli Apartheid state and its perpetration of racist crimes against humanity including ethnic cleansing and acts of genocide.

YMCA Web links to Palestinian web site

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — YMCA Canada is asking the World Alliance of YMCAs to clarify its policy of linking its site on the World Wide Web to a pro-Palestinian Web site.

The practice contradicts a policy position adopted in April by the executive committee of the World Alliance to ensure that all its publications, including its Web site (www.ymca.int), would clearly distinguish between official documents and those that represent other viewpoints. It appears the World Alliance has not yet implemented that policy decision, said Silvana Anania, director of international relations for YMCA Canada.

Contradicts policy

"Our view has always been the same, that we would like to see a balanced approach. So we asked the World Alliance and Mr. Nightingale (the organization's secretary general) for a rationale for having one link to one site," Anania said.

The decision by the World Alliance's executive committee to make changes to the organization's Web site came during meetings held April 22-28 in Dakar, Senegal. At the time, YMCA Canada and YMCA of the USA were concerned by a one-sided report by an international YMCA team that presented only the Palestinian perspective on the Middle East conflict.

The Canadian representatives wanted to know why the report was posted on the official World Alliance Web site and why the highly contentious report was undertaken at all, said Sol Kasimer, chief executive officer of YMCA Canada, prior to departing for Senegal.

"We don't support the report because we don't believe the World Alliance should take positions on political conflicts," Kasimer told The CJN at the time.

Kasimer said YMCA Canada would like the world body to remain neutral in the conflict and preserve for itself a role as "mediator and bridge-builder."

The meeting in Senegal was "difficult," Anania said. "As strong as these feelings were in North America opposing the report, there was support for it in Europe, Africa and Asia."

In the end, the executive committee agreed on a five-point plan that included the resolution that "all World Alliance Publications, including the Web site,will clearly distinguish materials that represent approved positions of the World Alliance and those that represent other viewpoints. In particular, the World Alliance will segment its Web site so that there is a clear division between approved positions and policy documents, and other secondary documents."

More than four months after the position was adopted, the World Alliance Web site continues to offer a direct link to the controversial Mideast report. It is prefaced with a statement that "the report's findings speak for themselves" along with the disclaimer that the World Alliances' executive committee has not considered the report's conclusions, and that they do not "necessarily represent the views of individual national YMCA movements."

A second link called "Palestine" takes visitors to the "Badil resource centre for Palestinian residence and refugee rights."

The World Alliance describes the site as offering "alternative, critical and progressive information and analysis on the question of Palestinian refugees in our quest to achieve a just and lasting solution for exiled Palestinians based on the right of return."

That formulation angered Harold Brief, vice-chair of international affairs for Canadian Jewish Congress. Brief pointed out there was no disclaimer on the link indicating it did not represent the official position on the World Alliance.

The Badil Web site presents strictly pro-Palestinian propaganda that Brief says is full of factual errors and "historical revisionism about the birth of the State of Israel.

"When I saw this, I was absolutely appalled by it ...The question is, what are the Canadians going to do about it?"

Responding to Brief's concerns that the World Alliance did not adopt its executive's directives, YMCA Canada sought clarification from the World Alliance, Anania said.

Brief, who has been a member of the YMCA for 10 years, said Congress would like linkages to the Palestinian site removed.

Leo Adler, director of national affairs for the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, said "it is disconcerting" the Web site does not comply with the agreements reached in Senegal. Anything to do with the Palestinian issue should have remained internal and not posted on the Web until formally adopted by the World Alliance, he added.

Following the initial round of controversy in February over the pro-Palestinian report, the World Alliance responded with a statement saying it supports justice for Palestinians and security for Israel.

"The World Alliance of YMCAs' standpoint on the question of Palestine is similar to the positions of many organizations. It also does not differ from what peace movements within Israel advocate and argue for. The international community broadly takes the view the Palestinians are the victims of the ongoing tensions and lack the basic and legitimate right to a homeland to live in dignity...We condemn all violence, Palestinian and Israeli, as a means of resolving conflict."

Canada 'disassociates' itself from final text

ence a lot of the stuff that we influenced: things like the indigenous peoples text with regard to past injustices and [the] text with regard to the Middle East."

Despite Canada's stance, Canadian Jewish Congress has denounced the final declaration. In a telephone interview last Sunday from Halifax, where CJC national officers were meeting, president Keith Landy called it an "attempt at appeasement and compromise that was unacceptable."

Landy, who attended most of the Durban conference, called the final statement "tainted," and fears it will do little to combat racism and may even hurt Mideast peace with its call for Palestinian self-determination in an independent state (see page 5 for text excerpts).

Landy also found it troubling that references in the text to the Holocaust were made under the "Middle East" heading.

The conflict between Israel and the Palestinians is political and territorial and had no place at the conference, Landy said. The attempt to placate and appease the Arab bloc resulted in an absurd final declaration, he added.

"The United Nations has once again discredited itself as a body able to promote global peace and security," he said.

In a statement issued from Halifax, CJC said the inclusion in the final draft of a reference to the Palestinian 'right of return' "is a transparent attempt to deny the Jewish people their right to self-determination and is the most obvious of many unacceptable elements."

CJC said it appreciated Fry's efforts to dissociate Canada from parts of the text on the Middle East. "Nevertheless, we strongly believe that little was to be gained from Canada's continued participation, and it ought to have left."

According to reports, Muslim countries objected to efforts to delete additional text that many delegates felt indirectly referred to Palestinians, including a paragraph that said "foreign occupation... is among the forms and sources of racial discrimination."

Canada, Brazil and the European Union said they would vote against the paragraphs had they remained in the text. And the EU, backed by Canada and others, refused to allow the conference to take sides in the Middle East conflict. Arab states said the final draft was watered down.

"Despite the fact that the text expresses concern about the plight of the Palestinian people under foreign occupation, it failed to condemn the discriminatory policies and practices of Israel," according to a statement by the Organization of Islamic Conference.

"Regrettably, our repeated attempts to initiate negotiations on this issue... have been thwarted by other parties," it said.

Israel's foreign ministry issued a statement saying the country "expresses satisfaction," but that the final conference document was "not the best."

"The world rejected the attempts of the radical Arab nations to take over the conference and damage its intentions by turning it into a stage for attacking Israel," it said.

Time to stand together

There can be hardly any doubt as to how one can understand and apply that profoundly loving exhortation in the context of today, on this Rosh Hashanah, 5762.

One year ago, Yasser Arafat let loose upon Israel, upon world Jewry, and, as events will ultimately show, upon the West as well, an ogre of violence and killing that has now transmogrified into a horror of hate and evil.

It began, as we all know, as a malevolent calculation by the PA leader to destabilize the West Bank and Gaza through anarchy and to cast Israel in a harsh international light by compelling it to react severely to the bloodthirsty behaviour of the Palestinian "street." But, like a large blot of blood that stains in unpredictable patterns, Arafat's anarchy soon evolved into a fundamentalist-led frenzy, directed by a large part of the Islamic world, for the killing of Jews wherever they could be found, and into an attack on Jewish history. This reinvigorated, medieval assault against Israel and all Jews intensified last week in Durban with an attack against some of the West's most cherished values, foremost among which are truth and the sanctity of human life.

What most of us, these past eight years, had hoped was a territorial, political dispute with the Palestinians, we see clearly now to be a religious, national, existential struggle for the very life of the Jewish State and for Judaism itself.

On the eve of Rosh Hashanah 5762, therefore, we Jews must "choose life." The way we do so is by opposing the horror let loose by Arafat with all our might, resolve, resources, integrity, sense of justice, mutual reliance one upon the other and faith.

When Moses entreated us, in God's name, to "choose life," he spoke to the entire Jewish people. There were no exceptions. He included everyone, because he knew that Israel's unique strength flows from the entirety of the people. "Atem nitzavim hayom culchem lifnei hashem..." "You stand today, all of you, before God."

Just as the soldier in the photo on page one stands together with a diverse group of Jewish children on the promontory of Gilo looking toward the point of danger in nearby Beit Jalla, so too must we stand together, figuratively and literally, in all our diversity, wherever we live.

We stood then, all of us together, in parshat Nitzavim; we must stand, all of us together again today. When the shofar is sounded next week in synagogues throughout the world, let this be part of what we hear.

An appropriate time to begin standing together will be on Sept. 23 when most major Jewish communities in North America rally on Israel's behalf. Everyone who is able to take part should.

When we were young we believed that we could change the world. Now that we are older, we find we have no choice but to do so. Anything less would betray our obligation to choose life.

Shanah Tovah. May peace be granted to us this year.

Opposes Syria's candidacy

Anything other than a resounding negative vote (not an abstention) by Canada on Syria's candidacy for a seat on the United Nations Security Council would be a betrayal of everything for which this country stands.

In addition to its sponsorship, its continued occupation of Lebanon and its dictator's brutish anti-Semitism voiced in front of the Pope, Syria's abysmal record of ignoring human rights has existed for decades.

Its oppression of its minorities has been catalogued by such organizations as Amnesty International and Middle East Watch. The brunt of this oppression was visited upon its Jewish community which was held hostage for over a half century.

That a country which ransomed off human beings in the latter part of the 20th century, extorted bribes to permit Jewish businessmen to maintain their activities, and which lived by the rule of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without charge or trial (or sometimes trial in a kangaroo court where defendants were not permitted legal representation or the right to speak), would be laughable if it were not so serious.

Canadian governmental authorities have been well aware, over these many years, of the kind of treatment meted out by Syria to its population. For a country that has always prided itself on preserving human rights, it would be hypocritical for Canada to avoid everything in its power to block such a scandalous elevation.

In what sometimes seems to be a world gone mad, it would be a welcome breath of sanity for Canada to take the principal position and vote "no" as a clear example for all UN members.

Gerber gets it wrong

In her article "Time to end 'victim mentality'" (CJN, Aug. 16), Jean Gerber writes: "Look at us," the Palestinians scream. "We are the victims of a bogus nationalism that has no legitimate right to be here." "Aha," Israel responds. "You deny us our history of suffering and our right to be here."

No, Ms. Gerber, this is not at all what Israel responds. The vast majority of Israelis do not regard themselves as victims of history or of past suffering – only as citizens of a peace-loving country – at present under fire by suicide bombers and their ilk.

Credit where credit is due

We would like to thank Jennifer Paquette for her article on Kolel's continued growth (CJN, Aug. 16). However, we wish to give credit and acknowledge that although Rabbi Goldstein has been the director of Kolel since its birth in 1991, Kolel was actually founded through the visionary efforts of Mr. Stephen Morrison and the Canadian Reform movement, who recognized the need and the timing for serious, high level, ongoing liberal text study here in Toronto.

Kolel retains an affiliation with the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, along with a deep commitment to pluralistic and inclusive learning, as we invite the entire community and teachers from across the religious spectrum to celebrate our 10th anniversary this year.

Peace includes self-defence

Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon has escalated the use of force to defend Israelis and Israel, and many argue that even more is needed. Not so, says Boris Freesman in his letter in the CJN on Aug. 23.

Freesman's letter is full of absurd non sequiturs. It is the Arabs, not the Jews as he argues, who clamour for "revenge and the pursuit of justice without concern for mercy" as they kill women and children. The Jews just want to live. He even argues for "the supremacy of peace above all values," including presumably, self-defence. How absurd. As the Talmud says, if someone comes to kill you, rise up and kill him first.

Haven't the "peace in our times" or "peace now" adherents caused enough harm with their aversion to standing up to the enemy and to calling a terrorist a terrorist? How many more Jews have to die before the diehards will acknowledge that they were and are wrong and take responsibility for the disastrous state of affairs we find ourselves in today?

Perspectives

'Humanity sacrificed to political agenda'

By RABBI MICHAEL MELCHIOR

Excerpts from Deputy Foreign Minister Rabbi Michael Melchior's statement to the UN Conference Against Racism in Durban, Monday, Sept. 3, as delivered by Ambassador Mordechai Yedid.

Why, when the world was created, did God create just one man, Adam, and one woman, Eve? The rabbis answered: so that all humankind would come from a single union, to teach us that we are all brothers and sisters.

This conference was dedicated to that simple proposition. We, all of us, have a common lineage, and are all, irrespective of race, religion or gender, created in the divine image. Indeed, this single idea, unknown to all other ancient civilizations, may be the greatest gift that the Jewish people has given to the world, the recognition of the equality and dignity of every human being.

The foremost right that follows from this principle is the right to be free, not to be a slave. It is imperative that the international community address and duly acknowledge... the magnitude of the tragedy of slavery.

The horror of slavery is profoundly engraved in the experience of the Jewish people – a people formed in slavery...

Through the ages of our exile, this psychodrama has had a profound impact on the Jewish psyche: making sure that every child born into comfort knows the pains of oppression, and every child born into oppression knows the hope of redemption.

But remembrance of our suffering as slaves has a more important function – to remind ourselves of our moral obligations. The experience of oppression brings no privilege, but rather responsibility.

We have a responsibility to protect the weak, the widow and the orphan and the stranger, because as the Bible says: "You yourselves were strangers in the land of Egypt."

Even God, in the first and most fundamental of the Ten Commandments, identifies Himself not as "Creator of the World" or "Splitter of the Red Sea," but as "the One who freed you from slavery."

And indeed, in every country in which they have lived, Jews have been in the forefront of the battle for human rights and freedom from oppression.

The same urge for national liberation that led to the Exodus and that led to the Zionist dream that Jews could live in freedom in their land, was intrinsically bound up with the belief that not just one people, but all peoples, must be free...

Madame Chairperson, if slavery is one form of racist atrocity, anti-Semitism is another... [Anti-Semitism] is a unique form of hatred. It is directed at those of particular birth, irrespective of their faith, and those of particular faith, irrespective of their birth. It is the oldest and most persistent form of group hatred; in our century, this ultimate hatred has led to the ultimate crime, the Holocaust.

But anti-Semitism goes far beyond hatred of Jews. It has arisen where Jews have never lived, and survives where only Jewish cemeteries remain. And while Jews may be the first to suffer from its influence, they have rarely been the last.

Anti-Semitism reveals the inner corruption of a society, because at its root it is fueled by a rejection of the humane and moral values the Jewish people bequeathed to the world...

Those who cannot bring themselves to recognize the unique evil of anti-Semitism similarly cannot accept... the Holocaust, the first systematic attempt to destroy an entire people. The past decade has witnessed an alarming increase in attempts to deny... this atrocity, at the very time that the Holocaust is passing from living memory to history. After wiping out six million Jewish lives, there are those who would wipe out their deaths.

Michael Melchior

At this conference too, we have witnessed a vile attempt to generalize and pluralize the word "Holocaust," and to empty it of its meaning as a reference to a specific historic event with a clear and vital message for all humanity...

Madame Chairperson, the 20th century which witnessed the atrocities of the Holocaust also witnessed the fulfilment of the Zionist dream, the re-establishment of a Jewish State in Israel's historic land. For Zionism is quite simply that – the national movement of the Jewish people, based on an unbroken connection, going back some 4,000 years, between the People of the Book and the Land of the Bible. It is like the liberation movements of Africa and Asia, the national liberation movement of the Jewish people.

And it is a movement... which... has strived continually to establish a society which reflects highest ideals of democracy and justice for all its inhabitants...

The aspiration to build such a society was enshrined from the outset in Israel's Declaration of Independence: "The State of Israel... Will foster the development of the country for the benefit of all its inhabitants; it will ensure complete equality of social and political rights to all its inhabitants, irrespective of creed, race or gender; it will guarantee freedom of religion, conscience, language, education and culture."

It is a tall task. It is a constant struggle. And we do not always succeed. But even in the face of the open hostility of its neighbours and continued threats to its existence, there are few countries that have made such efforts to realize such a vision. Few countries of Israel's age and size have welcomed immigrants from over one hundred countries, of all colors and tongues, sent medical aid and disaster relief to alleviate human tragedy wherever it strikes, maintained a free press, including the freest Arabic press anywhere in the Middle East.

And yet those who cannot bring themselves to say the words "the Holocaust," or to recognize anti-Semitism for the evil that it is, would have us condemn the "racist practices of Zionism."

Did any one of those Arab states which conceived this obscenity stop for one moment to consider their own record?

...These states would have us believe that they are anti-Zionist, not anti-Semitic, but again and again this lie is disproved. What are the despicable caricatures of Jews that fill the Arab press and are being circulated at this conference? What are the vicious libels so freely invented and disseminated by our enemies – about the use of poison gas, or depleted uranium bullets, or injecting babies with the Aids virus – if not the reincarnation of age-old anti-Semitic canards?

To criticize policies of the government of Israel – or of any country – is legitimate, even vital; indeed, as a democratic state, many Israelis do just that. But there is profound difference between criticizing a country and denying its right to exist.

Anti-Zionism, the denial of Jews the basic right to a home, is nothing but anti-Semitism, pure and simple. As Dr. Martin Luther King Jr. wrote: "You declare, my friend, that you do not hate the Jews, you are merely 'anti-Zionist.' And I say, let the truth ring forth from the high mountaintops. Let it echo through the valleys of God's green earth: When people criticize Zionism they mean Jews... Zionism is nothing less than the dream and ideal of the Jewish people returning to live in their own land...

"And what is anti-Zionism? It is the denial to the Jew of the fundamental right that we justly claim for the people of Africa and freely accord to all other nations of the globe. It is discrimination against Jews because they are Jews. In short, it is anti-Semitism."

The venal hatred of Jews that has taken the form of anti-Zionism, and which has surfaced at this conference is, however, different in one crucial way from the anti-Semitism of the past.

Today it is being deliberately propagated and manipulated for political ends. Children are not born as racists. Racism is a result of lack of education and political manipulation. And today generations of Palestinian children are being deliberately and systematically indoctrinated, with textbooks stained with blood libels, and children's television programs dripping with hatred. This high-risk strategy is bound to fail, but it will exact a heavy price.

The conflict between us and our Palestinian neighbours is not racial, and has no place at this conference. It is political and territorial, and as such can and should be resolved to end the suffering and bring peace and security to the Israeli and Palestinian peoples...

The outrageous and manic accusations we have heard here are attempts to turn a political issue into a racial one, with almost no hope of resolution.

Barely a year ago, at Camp David, the Israeli government demonstrated its deep commitment to peace by offering our Palestinian neighbours far-reaching compromises. These compromises, you will recall, were applauded by the entire international community. But the Palestinians did not accept these proposals, nor did they put forward any compromise proposals of their own.

To our deep dismay they responded with a wave of violence. Over the past year, this violence has escalated into protracted and inhuman attacks on the Israeli civilian population, forcing Israel to assume a role we abhor: defending our citizens by military means which we had hoped and prayed would be relegated to the past.

I will not refer here to the disappointing statement we have heard from the head of the Palestinian Authority. Rather than utilize this vital forum to inspire his own people, and the people of the world, to seek peace, honour and harmony, he chose to use this podium to incite to bitterness and hatred...

My own cousins, two little daughters and their brother, lost their legs only a few weeks ago in a terrorist attack on a bus carrying children to school. Many Palestinian children have likewise been wounded for life. The vicious libels, the delegitimization and dehumanization we have heard at this conference will do nothing to prevent more Israeli and Palestinian mothers and fathers bringing their young ones to their graves.

But here today, something greater even than peace in the Middle East is being sacrificed – the highest values of humanity. Racism, in all its forms, is one of the most widespread and pernicious evils, depriving millions of hope and fundamental rights.

It might have been hoped that this first conference of the 21st century would have taken up the challenge of, if not eradicating racism, at least disarming it. But instead, humanity is being sacrificed to a political agenda. Barely a decade after the UN repealed the infamous Zionism-is-racism resolution, which Secretary-General Kofi Annan described, with characteristic understatement, as a "low point" in the history of the United Nations, a group of states for whom the terms "racism," "discrimination," and even "human rights" simply do not appear in their domestic lexicon, have hijacked this conference and plunged us to even greater depths.

Can there be a greater irony than the fact that a conference convened to combat the scourge of racism should give rise to the most racist declaration in a major international organization since World War II?

Despite the vicious anti-Semitism we have heard here, I do not fear for the Jewish people, which has learned to be resilient and to hold fast to its faith. Despite the virulent incitement against my country, I do not fear for Israel, which has the strength not just of courage, but also of conviction.

But I do fear, deeply, for the victims of racism, for the slaves, the disenfranchised, the oppressed, the inexplicably hated, the impoverished, the despised, the millions who turn their eyes to this hall, in the frail hope that it may address their suffering. Who see instead that a blind and venal hatred of the Jews has turned their hopes into a farce. For them I fear.

We are here as representatives of states, and states, of their nature, have political interests and agendas. But we are also human beings, all of us brothers and sisters created in the divine image. And in those quiet moments when we recognize our common humanity, and look into our soul, let us consider what we came here to do – and what we have in fact done.

We came to learn from our history, but we find it being buried to hide its lessons. We came to communicate in the language of humanity, but we hear its vocabulary twisted beyond all comprehension. We came out of respect for the sacred values entrusted to us, but see them here perverted for political ends. And ultimately, we came to serve the victims of racism, but have witnessed yet another atrocity, committed in their name.

Shanah Tovah to all

I write this column at the beginning of Elul, the last month of the year 5761. The Hebrew letters, aleph, lamed, vav, lamed, are in our tradition the acrostic of ani l'dodi, v'dodi li, "I am my beloved's, and my beloved is mine." The traditional meaning of this citation from the Song of Songs is that God and Israel are ineluctably tied to one another by mutual love, which is a concept that a lot of modern Jews find difficult to embrace.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Be that as it may, the arrival of a new year should stir within us thoughts of anticipation and renewal, buoyed by the hope that it will bring new zest to our lives and even bring us a sense of happiness.

To be sure, the very words "happy new year" convey a vague sense of well-being, mixed with a portion of joy – and thus it is not surprising that we see it as something that would mean a brighter, more meaningful life for ourselves.

Yet somehow, "happiness" does not quite reflect our sense of hope for the new year – the Hebrew Shanah Tovah, "a good year," reflects it much better, implying something not only for ourselves, as "happy" does, but for others as well. For without a community that experiences well-being as a whole, we as individuals have little chance to lead a truly satisfactory existence.

To me, wishing others the very best for the coming 12 months cannot be purely personal but must also have my hope for the community attached to it, which means, of course, that our own involvement in the community during the coming year must show some signs of improvement. For what I have discovered in my discussions with a great variety of people is that they are, to a large extent, focusing on themselves to the exclusion – or near exclusion – of others. That is not the Jewish way.

The Pirkei Avot say it clearly: "If I am not for myself, who will be for me? But if I am for myself only, what am I? And if not now, when?"

To be sure, while the new year, like any celebration, appeals to us as individual persons, a Jewish celebration has always the mantle of community wrapped around it. Therefore, I would like to wish all my readers something that we can enjoy together: an Israel less threatened by its enemies, and a personal wish that life may give each of us an opportunity to serve others and thereby better our own existence.

I would like to think that this is expressed when we wish others a Shanah Tovah, and this is what I hope for you as I do for all of us.

'If I am not for myself, who will be?'

A new year is about to start. For that new year, let's examine the message conveyed in the epigram, "If I am not for myself, who will be?"

Recently I was in conversation with a Vancouver friend who has lived and raised his family in Israel. His perspective on "the situation" showed me what role Canadian Jews can play – for if we are not for ourselves, who will be?

Jean M. Gerber in Vancouver

In 1978, Howie and Elaine Nixon moved to Israel "because that's where Jews should live," and, "for adventure."

"The idea of being a lawyer on the 25th floor of an office building in a big corporate law firm struck me as the worst thing on earth," Howie recalled. "I wanted the excitement of living in a place where I would not be bored – and I got it!"

What about reports that negotiations with the Palestinians are going on behind closed doors? He laughed: "I'm not behind those doors, but everyone knows the parameters of a final deal. A Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza, three or four groups of Jewish settlements, some refugee returns. It is a pity that more people will die before it comes to an end."

The Nixons have three sons. One is already in the army.

"Our first son in there was very stomach-churning," Howie said. "I did the army and I got my exemption papers from reserve duty a month after my son went into the army. It becomes part of life.

"There was hope in the mid-'90s that we were starting to move beyond [the Palestinian-Israeli conflict] to other issues like environment, but they keep getting pushed aside."

Surprisingly, while the intifadah has deflected attention from internal issues facing Israel, such as the religious-secular divide, these were not the most important to Howie.

"This to me is the single most difficult problem today in Israel – the growth of Shas and the potential alienation from the norms of Israeli society of a large portion of the population."

How so? "The emergence of Shas is very much a response of the second or third generation's sense of deprivation" of the Sephardi population of Israel.

"Shas," he said, "in many ways adopted Ashkenazi external garb. On the other hand, Rav Ovadiah [Yosef]'s thing has been to 'return the crown' – to restore Sephardi pride" and "supremacy of Sephardi Halachah" after the ascendancy of Ashkenazi tradition.

What is Howie's prophecy, his nevuah, for the coming year?

"I'm not a prophet, and therefore I don't want to be a fool. What happened in the last decade is that Oslo destroyed the dreams of the right, that we could have all that land and the Arabs would remain this invisible thing that didn't really bother us. The intifadah destroyed the dreams of the left, that we could have an amicable divorce and somehow we would have all the benefits of peace and no friction points. Reality has set in."

To him, it looks like long-term negotiations, but "I just can't see how it's going to happen." Yet, he said, "I firmly believe that Israel, after 2,000 years, is the beginning of the Jewish people's redemptive process. That is the heart of Zionism and why I moved to Israel.

"Arafat's goal has been to goad Israel into repressive actions to provoke international involvement. He knows how weak he is and always portrays himself as victim. Israel's existence being threatened is nonsense. The real issue is how do we allow ourselves to be portrayed internationally?"

And for ourselves?

"The Canadian government supports Syria's entry to the Security Council. The CBC calls Gilo a settlement, when it is even recognized by the Palestinians as part of Jewish Jerusalem. This is a perverse use of language. Here Canadian Jewry can mobilize itself to influence public opinion. You can have a very important role to play."

Not only for Israel, but regarding the farcical UN Conference on Racism, we have to be for ourselves in a very public way. We have MPs, we have access to media. Let the people elected to represent us know what it is we really want. If we are not for ourselves right now, who will be?

As for Howie, is he afraid? "More of Israeli drivers than of the intifadah."

And the move to Israel? "I don't regret it for a moment."

Next month: "If I am only for myself, what am I?"

A congregation's wake-up call

The High Holy Days are fast approaching. Some may begin their preparations for Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur a few days in advance. Jewishly, however, we are meant to ready ourselves for these "days of awe" well before – starting with the first days of the previous month – the month of Elul.

Bruce Elman in Windsor

Every morning and every evening, from the beginning of Elul until Hoshanah Rabah, we recite the 27th Psalm – "The Lord is my light and my help, whom shall I fear?" – a powerful affirmation of our faith in God. Also during Elul we sound the shofar every weekday morning, a spiritual wake-up call – a reminder to take stock of your life over the past year, ask for forgiveness and vow to do better next year.

Now, I have often written that my tendency towards introspection grows as the High Holy Days draw closer. I expect that this year will be no exception. I doubt, however, that I will be the only person at the Shaar Hashomayim Congregation in Windsor who will be engaged in serious soul-searching during the upcoming holy days. Indeed, the entire congregation – individually and collectively – has something very serious to contemplate.

Let me take you back two columns ago: the membership of the Shaar Hashomayim in Windsor was engaged in a referendum to determine whether the congregation should cease to be an Orthodox synagogue and instead join the Conservative movement. The vote was so contentious that Price Waterhouse was called in to supervise the counting of ballots. In the end, 70 percent of those who voted favoured joining the Conservative movement; only 30 percent voted to remain Orthodox.

Unfortunately, this majority was not sufficient. The bylaws of the congregation state that a change in the constitution requires two-thirds of eligible members. The Conservative "camp" needed another 21 votes. In spite of a voting period that lasted about two months and despite the fact that proxy ballots were permitted, 35 eligible members did not vote at all. Under the bylaws, each non-vote actually counts as a vote against! For the synagogue's members, the result of this referendum should serve as a wake-up call, requiring everyone to contemplate the future viability of the congregation.

There are two aspects to this future. First, how is the synagogue going to meet the needs of those members – a majority, in fact – who voted to change the religious orientation of the congregation? And, second, what will those members who wanted a change in orientation do now that such a change is unlikely?

For the congregation, the answer is actually quite simple – prayer, study and social action. The tfillot must be democratized. The shul, in its prayer services, must create greater opportunities for participation by both men and women. This may involve the institution of alternative services, perhaps for kabbalat Shabbat on Friday evening or Minchah/seudah shilishit on Saturday afternoon. Perhaps, it may involve a learners' minyan for women or special family services.

As well, an expansion of the opportunities for study may be necessary. This may mean creating classes where modern or non-Orthodox perspectives on Torah are utilized. Or it may mean encouraging the establishment of chavurot (co-operative prayer and study groups) within the synagogue.

As Jews, we all have an obligation to engage in acts of loving kindness, to perfect the world. Social action activities provide a great opportunity to involve many people in the work of the synagogue. Congregants sit on committees and boards, but they have to be encouraged to engage in the synagogue's real work.

For the individual congregant – for me – the question is much more difficult: can I achieve spiritual fulfilment in this congregation as it is presently structured or as it might conceivably be modified, short of it becoming a Conservative congregation? That is what I hope to have an answer to before the end of Neilah.

I want to start the new year with a clean slate, so if I have wronged any of you, whether in these columns or otherwise, whether in Edmonton, Windsor or elsewhere, whether intentionally or inadvertently, whether by action or by speech, I want to ask for your forgiveness. Shanah Tovah Umetukah!

The Oslo peace accords: What went wrong?

Officially ushered in amid fanfare and solemnity on a brilliantly sunny day in Washington on Sept. 13, 1993, the Oslo peace process is a smouldering ruin eight years on. Hopes and expectations have been dashed as the "peace of the brave" has dissolved into the intifadah, the low-grade war pitting Israel against the Palestinians. The famous handshake between Yitzhak Rabin and Yasser Arafat, which symbolized the start of an era of mutual trust and co-operation, is a fading memory.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Last year's Camp David summit, designed to put Israel's mercurial relationship with the Palestinians on a firmer footing, is now seen as a galvanizing force that touched off the second Palestinian uprising in 13 years.

Oslo emerged at an auspicious moment.

Iran, a focus of Islamic fundamentalism and anti-Israel fervour, lay all but prostrate after its protracted 1980-88 war with Iraq. Iraq, a seat of Arab radicalism, was virtually defanged in the 1991 Gulf War. The Soviet Union, an ardent supporter of the Arab cause, collapsed in 1991, while the United States, Israel's chief ally, became all the stronger.

Arafat, who had already embraced United Nations resolution 242, the keystone of Mideast diplomacy since the Six Day War, was gravely weakened by these developments and, in effect, sued for peace. Rabin, his Israeli counterpart, was persuaded by colleagues that Israel's occupation of the territories was ultimately untenable, that Israel could do business with the PLO, and that the talks with Palestinian representatives since the historic 1991 Madrid conference were futile.

Israeli and Palestinian pragmatists envisaged Oslo as a two-pronged process under which a five-year interim period would give way to a fullfledged peace treaty. The Declaration of Principles, hammered out in secret talks in Norway, was regarded as a preliminary framework to facilitate permanent-status negotiations on key issues like final borders, Palestinian refugees, Jerusalem and water rights.

Olso was underpinned by several assumptions. Rabin promised Arafat an incremental transfer of land and authority in the West Bank and the Gaza Strip, occupied by Israel since the 1967 Six Day War. In exchange, Arafat promised Rabin that the PLO, Israel's heretofore mortal enemy, would commit itself to a peaceful resolution of the Arab-Israeli conflict and would not resort to violence to achieve its political goals. The grand bargain was implicitly predicated on a two-state solution.

Once the Declaration of Principles was sealed, Israel and the Palestinians proceeded to flesh it out in a series of accords in 1994, 1995, 1997, 1998 and 2000. The Palestinian Authority (PA) was set up. Arafat, who had been forced by Israel in 1982 to move his headquarters from Beirut to Tunis, established himself in Gaza City. Israel withdrew from parts of the West Bank and Gaza, leaving its settlements, bypass roads and roadblocks intact. Due to these agreements, the PA today has full or partial possession of about 42 percent of the West Bank and more than two-thirds of Gaza. Israel, however, maintains overall security control.

By all accounts, Oslo reached its high water mark with the signing of the second interim pact on Sept. 28, 1995, passed in the Knesset by a margin of only one vote. There was a sense that Rabin and Arafat were true partners and that everything seemed possible, including Israel's acceptance by the Arab world. A year earlier, thanks to Oslo, Jordan had signed a peace treaty with Israel, the second Arab country after Egypt to do so. Meanwhile, Israel forged ties with Morocco, Tunisia and the Gulf States and with formerly hostile nations outside the region. Foreign investments poured into Israel. The Israeli economy boomed.

Yet black clouds loomed on the horizon. Israeli civilians were being murdered at an alarming rate by Palestinian rejectionists opposed to Oslo. After Baruch Goldstein massacred 29 Palestinians in Hebron, Hamas and Islamic Jihad launched a murderous suicide bombing campaign in Israel which has yet to subside. Rabin's assassination dealt Oslo another harsh blow, since he was a widely respected figure. His killer, Yigal Amir, was adamantly against territorial concessions, as were a significant proportion of Israelis, particularly Jewish settlers in the West Bank and Gaza.

Rabin's successor, the luckless Shimon Peres, lost the 1996 election by the skin of his teeth, undone by a spate of suicide bombings. The winner, Benjamin Netanyahu, was an outspoken foe of Oslo. Netanyahu grudgingly resigned himself to Oslo and eventually jettisoned the dream of Greater Israel.

Even so, he proved reluctant to hand over additional territory to the Palestinians, and thus soured the atmosphere. Under U.S. pressure, Netanyahu acceeded to the Hebron and Wye River accords, thereby sanctioning further Israeli withdrawals. Yet Netanyahu's relationship with Arafat was testy, and the peace process temporarily broke down after Netanyahu announced that Israel would build a new Jewish neighbourhood in Har Homa, in disputed eastern Jerusalem.

Shortly after Netanyhau's election triumph, widespread Palestinian demonstrations erupted in Jerusalem and the West Bank, following the news that Israel had opened an archeological tunnel near the Al-Aksa mosque. The strife, which claimed the lives of 15 Israelis and scores of Palestinians, was orchestrated by Arafat in direct contravention of his pledge to renounce violence.

The so-called tunnel riots were symptomatic of the Palestinians' disenchantment with Oslo. Final-status talks were still far off, as was the prospect of an independent Palestinian state. The occupation had not ended, though the vast majority of Palestinians were no longer under Israel's direct jurisdiction. Constant closures and curfews disrupted daily life in the Palestinian autonomous areas. Israel expanded settlements beyond the Green Line, with the Jewish population there growing by 52 percent since 1993. Home demolitions continued. The Palestinians' standard of living fell, and despair filled the hearts of ordinary Palestinians.

Netanyahu's successor, Ehud Barak, honoured the obligations Netanyahu had not met after the Wye River talks. He ordered the gradual withdrawal of Israeli forces from a further 13 percent of the West Bank. Yet Barak recoiled from making a mandatory third withdrawal, which would have given the Palestinians control of a much greater proportion of the West Bank. He also refused to release all Palestinian prisoners. Barak, too, failed to provide the Palestinians with a northerly safe passsage route connecting the West Bank to Gaza. These were violations of the Oslo accords.

At the Camp David summit and subsequently at Taba, Barak made a supreme effort to reach an end-of-conflict agreement with Arafat. He offered him about 90 percent of the West Bank, all of Gaza and custody of Arab neighbourhoods in East Jerusalem. Arafat walked away from this unprecedented Israeli offer without making a counter-proposal. Nor did he respond positively to President Bill Clinton's bridging proposals. Israel's current prime minister, Ariel Sharon, who has demonized Oslo and called Barak's proposals null and void, seeks interim accords instead.

The Palestinians claim that Barak's offer would have left them with an uncontiguous, unviable Palestinian state divided into four distinct cantons whose international crossing points, air space and water reservoirs would have been under Israel's control. At a minimum, the Palestinians are holding out for an Israeli withdrawal back to the pre-1967 borders, which, they say, constitute only 22 percent of historic Palestine, a compromise in and of itself.

Apart from Jerusalem, the volatile Palestinian refugee issue caused the breakdown of the Camp David summit. When Arafat insisted on the "right of return" of millions of Palestinians to their former homes, even peaceniks wondered about his real intentions: a two-state solution, or Israel's destruction by other means?

Oslo was also bludgeoned by the Palestinians' resort to armed struggle in the current intifadah. Inspired by Hezbollah's example in southern Lebanon, Arafat may want to achieve his objectives through blood and fire.

Arafat did not do enough to prepare his people for peace, nor did he call a halt to anti-Semitic incitement in the Palestinian media and in Palestinian schools. Arafat did not establish a rapport with the people of Israel, and his bitter denunciations of Israel, such as likening it to a racist state, alienated Israelis. And by pointedly questioned Jewish claims to the Temple Mount, he certainly did not endear himself to Israeli public opinion.

More seriously, Arafat violated numerous clauses in the Oslo accords, from the release of terrorists to the failure to collect illegal arms. Yet, as much as these violations contributed to Oslo's demise, both sides violated its letter and spirit. Oslo's collapse, which may foreclose Israel's chance to reach an accommodation with the Palestinians, could well haunt Jews and Arabs for years to come.

Like the voice of an angel

From the editor's desk

In the early autumn of 1937, as the last warm puffs of summer expired on the edge of cooler fall weather, three young Jewish men in Bodzentin, a small town of about 10,000 people near Kielce, received their notices of conscription into the Polish army.

The notices arrived a week after Rosh Hashanah. The lads were given three days to report for basic training. They would have to leave their homes on the day of Kol Nidrei.

One of the young men was a tailor who had been taught the art of sewing and the skill of the needle by his father with tenderness and gentle instruction, qualities for which his father was widely known in their community.

The new conscript was the youngest of five children. His brother, older by two years, was not called by the government to serve the country.

The army notice arrived while the young tailor was awaiting confirmation from the Jewish Agency of permission to set sail for the yishuv in Palestine. He would never know if that confirmation ever arrived.

The young man's mother could barely tear open the envelope that bore the notice, she had so feared the possibility of such a letter reaching her home. The army's unmistakable imprimatur on the sheet of paper was like a knife that stabbed her heart. She was overcome with dread and immobilized by a sense of spreading alarm.

After she read the three blunt paragraphs of the military directive to her son, the letter and the envelope fell to the floor where they lay, improbably, along with the rest of the day's unwanted dirt, for many hours.

In an effort to make less painful the passage of time until his departure, the young man decided to sleep at his uncle's home. But on the third day, he returned to his parents' home to bid his family farewell. The trembling in the air for the imminent Kol Nidrei mingled with the trembling in the hearts for the imminent farewell. The house was filled with sorrow and grief.

In an effort to steer harm away from his young son and onto himself, the father pleaded with Heaven. He beat upon his own breast even as he struck his head on the beveled edge of the cupboard drawers. Uncontrollably he sobbed as he embraced his son, as he squeezed the boy to his chest, as he held him tightly against his own aching, breaking heart, imploring God's protection for his boy through the dark days that he knew were coming with the next morning.

More than 200 people accompanied the three young Jewish men that day to the train station. It was like a funeral in Bodzentin. After sundown, as candlelight flickered and night covered the sky, the haunting, centuries-old melody of Kol Nidrei could be heard more melancholy than ever it had been for the tender, gentle tailor of Bodzentin.

He would see his son only briefly twice more.

The young man and his two companions travelled eastward to the Polish army's induction centre in Jaroslaw. At the centre, their first call was to the barber who clipped them of their hair and of the outward signs of their Jewish identity. Then they went to the quartermaster who gave them new clothes, their uniforms. In less than half an hour, the three young Jews from Bodzentin were Polish soldiers. After six torturous months of basic training, they were ready for war.

War came two years later. The Nazis stormed across the border of Poland on Sept. 1, 1939, the 17th day of Elul, 13 days before Rosh Hashanah. The German army advanced eastward across Poland as effortlessly as stone smashes through tissue paper.

"Within hours of the occupation of a town or village," as historian Martin Gilbert has noted, "Jews were singled out for abuse and massacre by special SS 'operational groups,' acting in the rear of the German fighting forces."

Jaroslaw, where the three Jews from Bodzentin were still stationed, was strafed and bombed by German fighter planes. The discipline at the army base quickly disintegrated; the soldiers broke ranks. Along with countless hundreds of others, the three Bodzentiner boys fled east, staying ahead, just barely, of the advancing Germans.

From one village to the next, they ran to save their lives.

From one village to the next, they ran to save their lives. After a number of days on the roads, they found themselves hungry, thirsty and dirty in the village of Belz, knowing no one nor where to go. And then, in the same way that a ray of light can suddenly emerge from behind a dark cloud, a young boy asked the three exhausted soldiers: "Are you Jewish?" It sounded to them like the voice of an angel.

The youngster led the men to his parents, who took in the bedraggled, wandering soldiers and gave them every generosity that was within their ability: baths, clean clothes, clean beds and a yom tov feast.

It was erev Rosh Hashanah.

The next morning, the young soldiers and the rest of the town of Belz awoke to the rumble of German airplanes bringing death in the low western sky. Everywhere, men and women ran to save themselves and their children. Many were struck down like sheaves of wheat falling under the blade of an enormous scythe.

The three soldiers kept running. They eventually escaped into the far eastern part of Poland, partitioned into Russia by agreement with its enemy, Germany, on Sept. 28.

Only the young tailor, however, was destined to survive the war.

Palestinian uprising will not break Israel's spirit: Olmert

BY SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Israel's spirit will not be broken by the current Palestinian uprising, Ehud Olmert, the mayor of Jerusalem, vowed on Sunday.

"Nothing will break the spirit of Israel," he declared in a speech that sounded like a rousing pep talk. "Nothing."

Speaking at Beth Sholom Synagogue on a day of escalating violence in Israel and the territories, Olmert acknowledged that Israel is living through extremely hard times.

"It's not that easy," he said of Israel's mounting death toll, which rose by five on Sept. 9 after suicide bombings in Nahariya and Beit Lid and a drive-by shooting in the West Bank. "It's very, very difficult."

"But nothing can break the determination of Israel," he added, his voice rising to a shout.

Olmert, who has been mayor since 1993, promised that eastern and western Jerusalem will remain united as Israel's capital.

"We will never give up our right to a united Jerusalem.

"Nothing will force us to give up and divide Jerusalem,"he added to a round of applause.

Olmert, a former Likud party member of the Knesset, sadly acknowledged that the current situation – the suicide bombings, the roadside shootings and so on – has become part of Israel's daily routine.

In an aside, he disclosed that one of the victims of last week's Nahariya bombing was a 19-year-old soldier who had been his son's pupil a few years ago.

Referring to the Aug. 9 suicide bombing which claimed the lives of 15 Israelis in a Jerusalem pizzeria, Olmert said he found it "painful and heartbreaking" to have attended their funerals.

But in the next breath, he said, "If we lose our spirit, it will be the end of everything. We have no choice but to carry on despite the pain."

Israel, he suggested, cannot reward violence.

He accused Yasser Arafat, president of the Palestinian Authority, of being eager "to shed Jewish blood" and of trying to "break Israel's spirit."

Several minutes later, he claimed that the Palestinian Authority's objective is Israel's destruction.

"We will win!" he shot back. But he warned that the price could be high.

Olmert charged that the Palestinians want to demoralize Israelis by repeatedly staging attacks in Jerusalem.

"Arafat knows that if he can make Israel pull out of Jerusalem, he knows there is no end to what he can achieve," he said in an apparent reference to eastern Jerusalem, conquered by Israel during the 1967 Six Day War and claimed by the Palestinians as their future capital.

"Every part of Israel is ours, and we don't have to apologize for it."

Jerusalem, he observed, is "the heart" of everything that is Jewish in Israel, as well as "the purest expression" of what Israelis have dreamed, prayed, cried and died for since the proclamation of Israeli statehood in 1948.

Israelis – and Jews in the Diaspora – have a special and unique relationship with Jerusalem.

"In all of history, never has there been a city more intimately linked to a nation – Israel and the Jewish people – than Jerusalem."

Analyzing the meaning of the prayer, Next Year in Jerusalem, Olmert said it gave Jews the fortitude and courage to carry on in the face of adversity and persecution.

"We knew, one day, we would be back in our homeland. This is the bottom line of everything that happens today."

Describing Jerusalem as "the basis of our strength," Olmert said it has never been an Arab capital.

The Arabs covet Jerusalem because of its historical and religious significance to Jews.

"They believe that if they take Jerusalem, they can take everything."

Urging Jews in Canada to consider aliyah and to visit Israel, Olmert noted, "Your expression of active support is enormously important. We're strong, but when you express your solidarity for Israel, we're stronger."

To another round of applause, he said, "When you stand up proud, everyone will know the Jewish people are united.

"We know you're here for us. We know you care."

Olmert pledged Israel will "keep" Jerusalem "for you, your children and your grandchildren."

Olmert's address was sponsored by Canadian Jewish Congress (Ontario Region) and Beth Sholom Synagogue in co-operation with a newly established organization, Canadian Friends of the Western Wall Heritage Foundation.

Jewish Life

Rosh Hashanah, the Jews & racism

By RABBI MENDEL KAPLAN

Rabbinic Reflections

The Arab bloc countries and their allies have soiled the anti-racism conference in Durban, South Africa, beyond repair. The hateful anti-Israel/Jewish rhetoric they have propagated has unfortunately derailed what could and should have been a tremendous opportunity to advance the cause of peace and tolerance in our strife-stricken world.

However, rather than focus on the tragedy of the lost chance to further this supremely urgent cause, I would like to focus on the accusations themselves. After all, we do call ourselves "chosen" and "special."

On Rosh Hashanah, we proclaim in the Musaf prayer: "Today the world was born." According to our sages, however, the world was actually created on the 25th of Elul. Rosh Hashanah (technically the sixth day of creation) is really the day God created humankind.

The Lubavitcher Rebbe of righteous memory, would explain this anomaly in the following manner: "Unlike every other created being, humankind alone was given the free choice of acquiescing to God's dominion or rebelling against it. Only we, via the powers of our intellect and thought processes, were gifted with the ability to acknowledge, and relate to God as the Sovereign of the universe.

"This uniquely human perception of God's omnipotence makes Rosh Hashanah, the day of our creation, eclipse the 25th of Elul, because with it comes the potential for imbuing this world with Godliness. Consequently, this new plateau overshadowed all previous levels of creation."

Adam and Eve were not Jewish. Noah wasn't Jewish. In fact, the first Jew didn't enter the arena until nearly 1,000 years after creation. Yet, the grand entrance of humankind into the spectre of genesis is marked, and celebrated – by us, the Jewish people – as the beginning of creation.

In the words of British Chief Rabbi Jonathan Sacks in the Jerusalem Post, Aug. 24, "When Thomas Jefferson sat down to write the immortal words of the American Declaration of Independence: 'We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal and are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights,' he was not drawing on the philosophy of ancient Greece. Neither Plato nor Aristotle would have understood them, convinced, as they were that some people were born slaves. Those truths were self-evident to only a mind steeped in the book of Genesis, with its revolutionary statement that all human beings are made in the image of God."

While this is true, the Bible also unequivocally states that the Jewish people are God's special chosen nation. It is the universally recognized credo of the Bible itself, which introduces the inherent and majestic dignity of the right to be different.

Although every human has the ability to serve God and cultivate a personal relationship with the Divine, Judaism believes that different peoples are given different opportunities and responsibilities. A gentile has seven mitzvot, while a Jew has 613. The families of nations that populate the globe can enjoy civil justice anywhere, while God has legislated to us that the Land of Israel is holy, and given to us for eternity.

Are we racist? We, whose homeland Israel is filled with Jews of every colour, shape and size imaginable, all of whom are regarded in the same exact fashion. Does Israel's Law of Return discriminate on the basis of any racial features? Of course not; instead it simply states that all members of the international Jewish family – notwithstanding their race, creed or colour – have the right to come home.

Perhaps the time has come for us to remember what does make us different. It has nothing to do with our colour or nationality, and everything to do with our spiritual responsibilities and obligations. If we choose to renew our commitment to Torah and the Jewish way of life, we will have answered the nefarious accusations emanating from Durban with dignity.

Actions always speak louder than words. By unabashedly continuing to upgrade our observance of Judaism, we will ultimately succeed in fulfilling our divine mandate of being "a light unto the nations," and usher in the blessed messianic era of peace and prosperity for all of humankind in this New Year, amen.

Chaim Baruch's Unofficial Bar Mitzvah Video

My nephew Chaim Baruch is good-looking and healthy and on the threshold of puberty.

He is tireless with a ball, kicking it and chasing it up and down hills, until with one great kick it has landed and lodged in the top branches of a tree.
He had borrowed the ball from a neighbour, and now spends the next two days throwing rocks at it, and shaking the tree, until the tree finally gives up.
He begins again to foot the ball.

But just call his name and he stops and turns to you with an open smile that asks "How can I help you?"

The trick is that his strictly and generously orthodox parents have taught him, besides all the usual, and how to play drums, nothing, except,
especially, to bless life, to be thankful.

But most of all on the threshold he enjoys it all too much to stop unless asked to.

Stumble

I just went for a walk where I stumbled on a memory:
the view from the front steps of the home I grew up in, similar houses lined up on the left and a playing field behind a row of trees on the right.

I saw forward in time to how I've always been under the protection of my parents and God,
even when I had not thought so,
and that this makes all the difference in the world to being in this world.

To stumble like this is a great blessing heaped upon others.

A wealth of literary riches

Books
Bernard Baskin

Good Fiction Guide*, edited by Jane Rogers, Oxford University Press, 2001.

A Dictionary of Writers and Their Works*, edited by Michael Cox, Oxford University Press, 2001.

Consider this: you are an inveterate reader and you've just finished a stimulating book. Where are you? On an airplane? In bed? At the beach? At home in your favourite chair? In your dentist or doctor's waiting room?

Wherever you are, you feel edified, enriched intellectually or emotionally. You scrutinize the book's jacket to glean information about the author. The book has been read, but you don't want to let go, to remove yourself completely from its influence.

What happens next? You want to discuss the book's content, message, characters, essential meaning or puzzling passages with others. How do they respond to the book? You are eager to make it a shared experience.

For these and similar reasons book groups are formed. Thousands of such groups, in all varieties, now exist across North America. An adult education authority has suggested that they fulfil different dreams and obligations for different people. They allow parents of young children a scheduled escape. They give those caught up in a demanding job a chance to relax. They offer tuition-free intellectual stimulation for others.

These groups overwhelmingly attract women and only a few courageous men, perhaps because the activity provides a form of retreat or oasis, a nurturing and binding experience that women find more appealing and rewarding than do men.

The Good Fiction Guide is ideally suited for reading groups looking for fresh ideas. It is also a splendid reference for readers trying to find their way around the mass of fiction in bookshops. For those who would like to try new authors and branch out into different areas of fiction, this guide will prove an invaluable and absorbing aid for reading enjoyment.

The book contains 34 brief essays by well-recognized authors and critics that discuss diverse literary genres. Each critic recommends his or her own personal top-12 favourite books in the subject discussed.

The evaluation of Canadian fiction written by Aritha Van Herk indicates that "Canadian writing is as varied as the country's multicultural, multiracial, and multigeographical dimensions... readers will find a sweep of thematic concerns, some of them indeed focused on Canada's enormous geography, but overall a mosaic of echoes and ethnicities."

Her rather eccentric list of the top 12 Canadian novels includes such familiar figures as Leonard Cohen and Marian Engel but also such little known authors as Sky Lee and Suzette Mayr.

A companion volume, A Dictionary of Writers and Their Works, lists over 3,000 authors by surname, allowing readers to find birth dates, death dates, and lists of their published works with publication dates and genre, all at a glance. A special feature of the volume is a listing of literary characters with short descriptions and the work in which they appear.

Perusing these books one recalls the inspired words of Leon Gutterman: "Without the love of books the richest man is poor; but endowed with this treasure of treasures, the poorest man is rich. He has wealth which no power can diminish; riches which are always increasing; possessions which the more he scatters the more they accumulate; friends which never desert him and pleasures which never die."

Rosh Hashanah, kids and the Net

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Rosh Hashanah is almost here – a time for solemn introspection. But that doesn't mean you and your family can't have some fun while getting ready for the holiday. There are plenty of Web sites that teach about the holiday through games, puzzles and activities parents can do with their children.

Virtual Jerusalem combines a good introduction to the holiday with games and more [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/ rosh/kids.htm]. There are holiday-related short stories and plans for creating a calendar, a mitzvah chart and a Jerusalem Tzedakah Box. The site has a page that tries to demystify the holiday and encourages kids to talk to God. To get things going, it includes comments from children aged four to six. Here's one from Sam, 6: "Dear God, Instead of making people die and having to make new ones, why don't you just hang on to the people you've already got here?"

The learn@JTS Kids' Corner emphasizes activities that parents can share with their children [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/roshhashanah/]. We are told that we eat symbolic foods on Rosh Hashanah to portend a good year: we eat a fish head for a year in which we will be at the head and not at the tail. Then the Web site challenges families to adopt some brand new food traditions. How about eating squash so that "bad luck may be squashed"? Also on the site, you'll find instructions for making a personalized Rosh Hashanah greeting card with your own fingerprint. And because this is the holiday for sweet foods, there are kid-friendly recipes for taiglach, chocolate-covered frozen bananas and Rosh Hashanah gingerbread wish cookies. (When the cookies have cooled, use icing pens to write a Rosh Hashanah wish on each one.) Jewish Family.com points out that since Rosh Hashanah is the world's birthday, it is appropriate to do something good for the world [http://www.jewishfa mily.com/jc/holidays/displayjc.php?text=http://www.jewishfamily.com/jc/holi days/rosh_hashana/family_social_action.txt]. Start by having your family finish these phrases: "We thank You for the beauty of the world that we see in..." and "Help us to make our dreams a reality by helping us to..."

And to demonstrate your care for the world and its inhabitants, calculate what it costs to prepare a special Rosh Hashanah family dinner and make a donation to Mazon: A Jewish Response to Hunger [http://www.mazoncanada.ca/].

I really liked the activities and ideas at JewishNewYear.com [http://jewish newyear.com/holidays/tishrei/4750] (Click on "Cool stuff for kids.") You can make your own honey jar that looks like a yellow and black honey bee, find out how a shofar is made and play some games. There are even recipes.

The Aish HaTorah site has some really challenging puzzles and mazes. And after you read through the holiday articles at the site, you'll be ready for the quiz [http://aish.com/holidays/ The_High_Holidays/family_activities. asp]. Here's a sample question:

What are the names of the sounds the shofar makes?

a) tekiah, truah, shevarim.
b) tefilah, Torah, sefarim.
c) tequilla, brew-a, collada.

We may no longer spend weeks huddled over a table preparing New Year's greeting cards. But you and your kids can send out special holiday wishes, and thanks to the Internet, you have plenty of time. There are many sites that let you compose and personalize on-line cards such as Blue Mountain [http://www.bluemountain.com/cdb/RGN/J/RH/], FreeWebCards [http://www.free webcards.com/cards/rosh-hashanah/] and High Holy Days on the Net [http://www.holidays.net/highholydays/].

If your kids like to colour, then don't miss the Torah Tots site [http://www.torahtots.com/holidays/rosh/rosh.htm]. You can print out and then colour holiday symbols such as the shofar and tashlich. There's also an on-line jigsaw puzzle in which you slide the little squares around until you make a picture showing apples and honey.

When you're done that, try the Replace the "Pickle" quiz. Can you make sense of this example? "We blow the 'pickle' after davening during the month of 'cucumber.' The shofar reminds us to do 'relish.'"

(Answers: shofar; Elul; tshuva)

And on that note, I would like to wish all my readers a good year in which you are inscribed in the Pickle of Life.

Holocaust Centre gets makeover, new name

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Visitors to the old offices of the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre, on the fourth floor of the Lipa Green Building, doubtless remember floor-to-ceiling stacks of books, files, cardboard boxes and piles of educational material cramping the small quarters.

Now, a $130,000 makeover and a new name have given the facility a renewed lease on life, and a future dedicated to Holocaust education and remembrance.

The Holocaust Centre of Toronto officially opened last week before over 200 invited guests, including government officials, survivors of the war years and the consuls general of Israel, Germany and Poland.

Ribbons were cut to the Robby Engel Memorial Lounge, home to the old office, and to the Anita Ekstein Holocaust Resource Library, located across the hall within the Albert and Temmy Latner Jewish Public Library.

The spacious Engel memorial lounge, named for the much-loved Holocaust educator and survivor who died in 1999, will house the centre's staff and serve as a meeting place. The Ekstein library, named for the former chair of the centre, occupies about 900 square feet in the JPL and will be a state-of-the art resource and research facility for students and teachers, Howard Driman, the centre's chair, told the opening ceremony.

Anita Ekstein and grandson, Cobi Lechem, 11, cut the ribbon to the Holocaust resource library named for her.

The library, which will house computers, videotapes and $30,000 worth of new books, was funded mainly by Ekstein's husband, Frank. They were joined by their grandchildren, who helped cut the ribbon.

"This is very close to my heart," said an emotional Ekstein, a child survivor of the Holocaust who spent years in hiding and owed her life to a Polish-Catholic family. "The passage of time means this is more important than ever. I hope people use it."

Engel's widow, Margo, cut the ribbon to the lounge. The adjoining Jacob Israeli and David Smuschkowitz Holocaust Museum will continue to house artifacts and the Hall of Memories, and to screen the audio-visual presentation From Out of the Depths.

More than a half-million visitors and students from around the world have toured the Holocaust Education and Memorial Centre since it opened in 1985. Over 25,000 students come to the centre each year to view the material and to hear talks from survivors.

The centre, which operates under the auspices of UJA Federation of Greater Toronto, together with the federation's old Holocaust Remembrance Committee, have planned a variety of programs over the years, including the student seminar at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education (OISE), a province-wide student essay writing contest, and the annual Holocaust Education Week, which has become the largest event of its kind in the world.

Driman said the Ekstein library will serve as Toronto's "primary repository" for educational materials, and will expand the centre's collection of books and both audio and videotapes of survivors' testimony.

Next autumn, Driman noted, Ekstein will chair an international conference in Toronto of former hidden children and child survivors of the Holocaust.

UNIVERSITÉ YORK UNIVERSITY

The Centre for Jewish Studies at York University

A Challenging Environment for Growth and Continuity

MESSAGE FROM THE DIRECTOR

Professor Martin Lockshin, Director, Centre for Jewish Studies

One of the central themes of the Jewish Days of Awe is that human beings are capable of change. We are able to improve ourselves and, the rabbis teach us, we are obligated to do so.

How do we improve ourselves? One of the most important things that Jews do every fall during the High Holy Days is reflect on their past. People cannot be introspective and cannot decide to do better next time until they understand what has already happened to them.

A liberal arts education in the university world has the same premise. Students can become better people by learning from the glories and from the ignominies of previous years. An interest in the past is not antiquarian; it is the only way to know how to be and how not to be in the future.

At the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University we believe that by studying the past our students get much more than an academic degree. Many of them tell us that their study of Judaism at York was a life-changing experience.

But introspection and change are not just for the students. At the Centre for Jewish Studies we constantly reevaluate our programs, build on our strengths and try to expand our activities to serve better the needs of the community.

Our Jewish Teacher Education program – whose graduates teach in almost all of the Jewish schools in Toronto – accepted more students this year than ever before. We now train teachers for western Canada, too. We have initiated new programs to train principals and other supervisory personnel for Jewish schools, and to provide support to teachers already working. We are expanding our course offerings and degree programs in many exciting ways. To name just one, we are currently searching for an established scholar to fill the new Silber Family Chair in the Study of the Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry, the first such Chair in Canada.

On behalf of the Centre I want to wish you a happy and healthy New Year, a year of growth and of change, of reverence for the past and of progress towards the future. We invite each of you in the community to help us build a stronger Centre for Jewish Studies.

Leonard Wolinsky Lectures on Jewish Life and Education

Accident will not affect JCC groundbreaking

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Two staff members and two contractors working at the Miles S. Nadal Bloor JCC were taken to hospital last week after they inhaled noxious fumes from a chemical spill in the centre's boiler room.

The spill or leak is believed to have led to a reaction between chlorine and muriatic acid, which are used in the normal operation of the centre's basement pool.

The injuries were not serious but the fumes led to a five-hour evacuation of the JCC as the fire department's hazardous waste unit cleaned up and ventilated the building.

Bill Emery, the centre's executive director, said it appeared a slow leak led the chlorine and muriatic acid to combine, creating a gas that left victims' eyes burning and their breathing difficult.

The accident will not affect a planned ground- breaking ceremony to officially mark a multi-million dollar renovation that will modernize the centre and ensure its continued vitality.

Work has already begun behind the scenes to upgrade the centre's creaky infrastructure, including its heating and mechanical systems. But on Oct. 22, the opening ceremony will mark the start of long-awaited construction on the building's north side, Emery said.

Four new shops, anchored by a Second Cup at the building's north-east corner, are planned for the first phase of the renovation. The centre has received offers from potential tenants for the other three shops and the combined rents should bring the centre $180,000 to $190,000 a year.

In the best case scenario, the shops should be open for business in June 2002 while work continues in other areas of the building, Emery said.

The renovation will proceed into what is today the auditorium, chapel and kitchen. Offices will be constructed above the new shops while to the south, a 300-seat theatre and two aerobics studios are planned.

The chapel will be relocated on the third floor, along with program rooms, a teen computer room and a conference room. The work will not affect services during the 2001 High Holy Days.

To date, $7.7 million has been raised towards the project. Miles Nadal, president and CEO of MDC Corporation, contributed $2.05 million towards the project and established an endowment fund as well, Emery said.

The centre continues to raise funds towards its ultimate $10 million goal, and Emery is optimistic that the sum is within reach.

When the Bloor JCC first considered a renewal project, its goals were much more modest, in the $3 million to $4 million range. But realizing that the centre was the major service provider for the estimated 30,000 Jews living downtown, the UJA Federation entered the picture and helped expand the scope of the project.

Alex Richman, chair of the centre's development committee, said "the original concept was to cement the centre's survival" by hosting income-producing tenants on the north side. The concept today is broader, to serve as a hub for the downtown community, he said.

The Miles S. Nadal JCC is operating in partnership with the UJA Federation, with the two organizations jointly planning its future. The building is owned by a non-profit corporation consisting of Federation and centre board members, while centre members control the JCC's operations committee.

Concentration camp guard may be deported

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A former SS concentration camp guard who entered Canada under false pretenses may lose his citizenship and be deported, as a result of a Federal Court decision announced recently.

Federal Court Judge W.P. McKeown ruled that Windsor resident Michael Baumgartner, 78,voluntarily joined the Nazi SS and served as a guard at Stutthof and Sachsenhausen concentration camps. The judge ruled Baumgartner would not have been eligible for entry into Canada had he revealed his wartime activities when interviewed by immigration officials in 1953.

McKeown rejected Baumgartner's version of events, in which the native of Hungary claimed he served in a tank unit after being coerced into joining the SS. Pointing to numerous inconsistencies in Baumgartner's testimony, McKeown said he did not find his evidence credible.

"Mr. Baumgartner seems to have a history of lying to various authorities in order to obtain what he wants," McKeown stated.

German wartime records indicate that as an ethnic German (Volksdeutsch) living in Hungary, Baumgartner volunteered to serve in the SS in April 1942, long before recruitment was compulsory, McKeown found.

The documents place Baumgartner in German concentration camps, where the fatality rate was more than 50 percent.

Camp guards were trained to shoot prisoners for a variety of transgressions and "the overall death rate at Stutthof was similar to those in other camps. Of the 110,000 recorded inmates of the camp, at least 65,000 did not survive," the judge stated.

Canadian Jewish Congress applauded the court finding.

"Sachsenhausen was a concentration and slave labour camp in which tens of thousands of Jews and Soviet prisoners of war were murdered," said Ed Morgan, chair of Congress' Ontario region.

"The finding of the Federal Court paves the way for the cabinet to proceed with his denaturalization and deportation. We urge the cabinet not to delay their deliberations so that closure can be brought to this case, resulting in at least a measure of justice for the victims of the Holocaust," Morgan concluded.

Adult learning centre opens

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The current renaissance in Jewish learning in this city will soon include the Florence Melton Adult Mini School (FMAMS).

"In 1986, the school opened its doors in three communities in North America," said Betsy Dolgin Katz, the North American director of the FMAMS.

It now exists in five different countries and has educated more than 14,000 students.

'The impact of the school around the world has been tremendous, Dolgin Katz said. "People are learning and the learning has had an effect on many lives."

Based on a curriculum developed by the Hebrew University of Jerusalem, the text-based program follows ideas through from biblical to modern times, says Loretta Tanenbaum, director of the program in Toronto.

It is an interactive, pluralistic curriculum which will portray ideas from across the religious spectrum, so that all points of view are reflected, Tanenbaum said.

The current rise in formal and informal adult Jewish learning is part of an increasing awareness that "it is OK to be Jewish and Canadian at the same time," Dolgin Katz said.

"Spirituality is in the air and if individuals want to take responsibility for their own religious beliefs, behaviour and commitments, they have to educate themselves."

To facilitate the interest, "more and more Jewish texts are being translated and are accessible," Dolgin Katz said.

Furthermore, parents feel that they should be taking more responsibility for teaching their children.

"Many women are also becoming involved in order to make up for the education from which they were excluded when they were young."

While a program related to the Melton Centre ran for a limited group at the Jewish Community Centre more than 10 years ago, this curriculum will be directed at the entire community.

In fact, participants will have the opportunity to meet others in their own cities, as well as take part in 10-week study seminars in Israel with students from around the world, Dolgin Katz said.

The teachers of the program here were chosen because of their interactive teaching skills and their abilities to transmit the material which is based on a sophisticated core of Jewish knowledge, Tanenbaum said.

Rabbi Shlomo Vilk, head of rabbinic studies at the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto, will teach the purposes of Jewish living, and Laura Wiseman, former director of Judaic studies at United Synagogue Day School will present the rhythms of Jewish living.

For further information, call Loretta Tanenbaum at 416-789-7400.

Historian refutes Vatican's 'inaccurate' accusations

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Jewish Canadian panelist on an international historians' commission studying Vatican policy before and during the Holocaust has rejected charges that its Jewish members are to blame for the panel's recent suspension.

Michael Marrus, a University of Toronto historian, called the charges inaccurate, and suggested that the Jewish historians on the panel have been unfairly "singled out" for criticism by the Vatican.

The group, made up of three Jewish and three Roman Catholic scholars, was created in 1999 by the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews and the International Jewish Committee on Interreligious Consultations.

Records reviewed

The historians agreed to review 11 volumes of published Vatican records from World War II and to pose questions about their findings.

Last October, they released a preliminary report posing 47 "significant questions" about the actions of Pope Pius XII and his adminstration during the 1930s and 1940s.

In June, Walter Cardinal Kasper, the president of the Vatican's Commission for Religious Relations with the Jews, informed the scholars that, for "technical reasons," an examination of post-1923 Vatican archives could not take place.

He asked the historians to prepare a final report, and referred them to Rev. Peter Gumpel, a Jesuit priest in charge of gathering documentation to support the beatification of Pope Pius XII, whom some historians believe did far too little to help Jews during the Holocaust.

In response, the historians suspended their study, saying they could not maintain their credibility without full access to Vatican archives.

Last month, Gumpel and Kasper lambasted the Jewish scholars.

Gumpel claimed they had launched a "slanderous campaign" against the church and had spread "the suspicion" that it was concealing documents.

Kasper claimed that the Jewish scholars had been indiscreet and had fomented "distrust," making further research impossible.

Marrus, a Holocaust specialist and dean of graduate studies at the University of Toronto, reacted indignantly.

Reached at his office last week, Marrus rejected charges that the panel's suspension is attributable to the Jewish historians.

Describing the accusation as "inaccurate," Marrus declared that the Jewish scholars have acted responsibly and remain committed to studying the issue impartially.

Michael Marrus

The scholars, he said, have conducted themselves in a "dignified, principled and forthright" manner.

Marrus expressed disappointment over the "intemperate language" used by Vatican officials in recent weeks. He voiced the hope that their views are not representative of official church opinion.

Marrus said he was shocked that Jewish panel members had been "singled out." As he put it: "We issued a preliminary report in October. All the scholars, Jewish and Catholic, signed it."

He added, "If we had come out with a report saying that Pope Pius XII was a wonderful friend of the Jews and should be beatified, we would have been embraced by the Vatican."

Rebuffing charges that he and two other Jewish historians, Robert Wistrich and Bernard Suchecy, had engaged in polemics, Marrus said, "This is not the case. We share Kasper's view that polemics are not constructive, or in the interest of the church and the Jewish people."

He denied accusations that he and his fellow Jewish historians had suggested that the Vatican was trying to hide documents.

"Nonsense," he exclaimed.

The Vatican, he said, should provide open access to its archives. "One day, they will doubtless be open. We want this to happen in the reasonably near future. We want to see some priority given to this project. It's a reasonable demand."

Despite the heated exchanges, Marrus said, the historians are willing to continue their work. "Our preliminary report awaits, and deserves, an answer. But I'm no longer so optimistic that the panel will take up its work."

Putting the current controversy into historical perspective, he pointed out that Catholic-Jewish relations have improved extraordinarily since the Second Vatican council in the mid-1960s.

"There are occasionally humps and setbacks along the road, and this affair is one of those setbacks."

Youth trips to Israel proceeded with caution

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — All the Canadian organizations affiliated with the Canada-Israel Experience Centre (CIEC) proceeded with their planned trips to Israel this summer, despite concerns related to the ongoing intifadah.

All the programs made significant changes to their itineraries, however, to reduce any risk to participants. "Safety and security is always paramount," said the CIEC's Adam Minsky, director of Israel and Overseas Programs.

Eliminating free time in crowded shopping areas was an example of one such change. Itineraries are planned and reviewed in close consultation with a number of authorities in Israel, Minsky said. There were no incidents or injuries related to the intifadah on any of the trips, the CIEC confirmed.

Although none of the Canadian programs were cancelled – as were the youth trips planned by the Reform movement's Union of American Hebrew Congregations – there were fewer Canadian students participating, "certainly in the high school programs," said Minsky.

This spring, only eight students of a potential 20 took part in the Calgary Jewish Academy's annual Israel trip for graduating students completing their Grade 9 year. Last year 25 out of a class of 26 made the trip, and in the first year, 1999, 30 of 33 took part.

Although the numbers this year are "very atypical," according to school director Claude Oppenheim, he believes that the group would have been smaller regardless of the situation in Israel.

Even before the intifadah started, Oppenheim said, there were "more than the usual number of parents who feel Grade 9 is too young...Obviously the security thing did exacerbate it. Every parent has to make that decision for himself or herself. We certainly respect that some parents don't feel such a trip is appropriate [for them]."

There was no serious thought given to cancelling the trip, which includes visiting and touring with counterparts in the Galilee Panhandle, Oppenheim said.

"It's an important part of the curriculum of the school. In terms of security considerations, we accept the guidance of the Israel Experience people. Their judgment was that it was appropriate [to go]."

Oppenheim said there was little in the way of modification – aside from a cancelled weekend, which was deemed to be "too close to trouble.

"We anticipated there would be far more," he said. "The trip went without a hitch. It was a fantastic experience."

As in previous years, Oppenheim phoned in daily updates so that parents could access information on an ongoing basis.

Other western Canadian high schools that had Israel trips were Edmonton Talmud Torah and Winnipeg's Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate.

Canadian Young Judaea, the largest Israel trip provider in Canada for high school-age students, has been sending 16- and 17-year-olds to Camp Biluim Israel every summer since 1970. Its numbers were down this year to 40, compared to 185 last year.

Birthright Israel, the free 10-day program offered for 18-to-26-year-olds, did not see any drop in numbers for its CIEC summer program this year, although there were some cancellations. (New vacancies were filled from a waiting list.)

Canadian Birthright trips included a new three-week version, in which 10 days were free, and there was a cost for the remainder of the trip, which was extended to offer a more in-depth experience.

Minsky attributed the relatively low number of cancellations for this summer to the fact that registration took place following the outbreak of violence last fall.

The winter program – in which 1,000 students participated and for which there was a waiting list of 3,000 – had more cancellations because registration took place last August and September, before the conflict escalated, he explained.

For the summer, Minsky said, "they registered with more of a sense of the reality of the situation."

The Canada-Israel Experience Centre has been allocated 1,800 spots for this winter's Birthright program, for which registration will conclude Oct. 5.

Birthright Israel hopes to draw a total of 10,000 young North American Jews on its program this winter, but the outbreak of the Palestinian uprising has made many people skittish. Thousands of U.S. registrants cancelled, and Birthright was able to send only 8,653 North Americans this winter, even after depleting waiting lists. That was an increase from the 6,041 who went the previous winter, but lower than the target number. Another 5,700 young adults went in May and June, down from the 7,562 initially planned.

A related aspect of the students' experience this summer was the reception they received from local Israelis, in light of the decrease in tourism Israel has been experiencing.

"It was outstanding," said Minsky. "We felt and were treated like family that had come from overseas. It created a really exciting and positive atmosphere."

Barenholtz was a major importer of kosher food

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Businessman Barney Zelig Barenholtz died at his home on Aug. 31, after a long illness He was 76.

Obituary

He was best known as the owner of Kofman Barenholtz Ltd., one of the major importers of kosher food in Canada.

Barenholtz was born in Toronto to a prominent religious family, said Rabbi Joseph Kelman, rabbi emeritus of Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Congregation. His father was a shochet and owner of Barenholtz Bookstore on Dundas Street.

Barney Barenholtz joined Kofman and Fine, a company that sold kosher food, as a stockboy, later becoming a salesman. Eventually, he bought the business and changed the name to Kofman Barenholtz, but retained Kofman's name "out of respect," Rabbi Kelman said.

The business flourished as he began to import kosher lines from, among other places, the United States, Israel, France, Switzerland and England.

Rabbi Yitzchok Kerzner, chair of the Rabbinical Vaad Hakashrut of the Kashruth Council of Canada (COR), said that although Barenholtz dealt mainly with products from out of Canada, nevertheless "the Kashruth Council had a longstanding relationship with him. He was always very co-operative. We found he always tried to render service to the Jewish community."

Rabbi Kelman called him "Mr. Beth Emeth." Barenholtz, he said, was a founding member and the first president of the shul, a position he held three times. In fact, when it was "just a hole in the ground," he encouraged the young Rabbi Kelman to take the position of spiritual leader.

Because Barenholtz had a good reputation, as well as "having a wonderful smile and being a wonderful host," he attracted other people to the shul family.

However, Rabbi Kelman said, he "never looked for kovod."

Barenholtz was very generous, both publicly and privately. He donated two Torahs to Beth Emeth, one on his 25th wedding anniversary and the other when Rabbi Kelman retired. He also donated Torahs in Israel – to his father's shul in Bat Yam and his daughter's shul in Maaleh Adumim.

Every week, he would donate food to Tomchei Shabbat, an organization that distributes food to needy families, so that they can celebrate Shabbat. On Pesach, he would give Rabbi Kelman the wherewithal to provide for several families – he didn't want to know which ones.

Besides that, his daughter, Shevy Shumacher, told The CJN, he gave a lot of tzedakah anonymously. "People kept coming and calling the shivah, and saying how he had helped them, even setting some up in business."

His hobby, both she and Rabbi Kelman said, was travelling to Israel, especially to see his family, including his father and grandchildren.

He would also take the opportunity to seek out new products to import to Canada.

Barenholtz is survived by his wife of 55 years, Freda, daughters Shevy Shumacher and Marsha Gallinger, sisters Gertie Miskin, Mary Schott, Shirley Feldman and Mayna Slatt and nine grandchildren. He was predeceased by sister Chana Gross, and brothers David, Sholom, and Jonas.

OISE scholar explores Mideast co-op community

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Built on a hillside 30 kilometres west of Jerusalem, Neve Shalom/Wahat Al-Salam is a unique co-operative community and a shining beacon of hope in the troubled Middle East.

Founded in 1972 as an intercultural experiment, this Arab-Jewish village is a model of coexistence and mutual respect in a turbulent region where such utopian concepts have been dashed on the rocks of tribal nationalism and intolerance.

Grace Feuerverger, a scholar at the Ontario Institute for Studies in Education, University of Toronto, has written what she thinks is the first book about Neve Shalom.

Oasis of Dreams: Teaching and Learning Peace in a Jewish-Palestinian Village in Israel (RoutledgeFalmer) was published recently, as the second Palestinian uprising burned brightly and showed no sign of abating.

"I wrote it because, right from the beginning, it gave me a sense of hope in spite of the deadly conflict all around," explained Feuerverger, an associate professor in the Centre for Teacher Development, department of curriculum.

"I wanted to share this hope with others."

The daughter of Polish Holocaust survivors, she heard about Neve Shalom by chance after having lived in Israel for a year.

Visiting the village for the first time in December 1991, she returned five more times in the next nine years.

She wrote the book, an ethnographic study, without any political ulterior motives.

Grace Feuerverger

Her objective was to explore "the complex journey of Jews and Palestinians trying to break down barriers of fear and mistrust" while maintaining their respective culture and language.

"This place has nourished my soul," said Feuerverger, who was born and raised in Montreal.

"It is a symbol. It shows us what is possible in spite of all the obstacles. We need to believe in the possibility of peace. We need to hope, especially now, in a time of despair. That is why this is a sacred place for me."

That she was drawn to Neve Shalom, and remains inspired by its possibilities, is anything but coincidental.

A graduate of McGill and the University of Toronto, Feuerverger's research interests focus on, among other topics, theoretical and practical issues of cultural and linguistic diversity, ethnic identity maintenance and minority language learning.

Her research projects, as well as the courses she teaches, revolve around people who live within and between various cultural milieus.

An accomplished linguist, she speaks French, Italian, Yiddish, Hebrew and Polish. As an undergraduate, she won the prize for highest marks in German and Russian.

After earning a degree in French and Italian studies at McGill and a diploma in Italian language and literature at the University of Stranieri in Perugia, she taught French in Edmonton and Toronto schools.

"Since I was very young, I knew I wanted to be a teacher," she said. "I still feel joy and anticipation when I enter a classroom. It is a privilege to share ideas and issues.

"To me, real education is about sharing our humanity, in all its frailty, vulnerability and majesty," she added. "I believe teaching is an act of faith, and especially an act of love."

In 1979, she resigned from the North York Board of Education, having decided to study applied linguistics at OISE.

"It was very difficult giving up my teaching position, but I had always wanted to go to graduate school. I woke up one morning realizing that the time had come. And yet, I am never far from the classroom in my research work, [as] most of it school-based."

After finishing an MA, the subject of which was the ethno-linguistic vitality of Italo-Canadian students in Toronto, she enrolled in a PhD program at the University of Toronto.

The subject of her thesis was Jewish-Canadian ethnic identity and non-native language learning.

At OISE, Feuerverger lectures on language, culture and identity within the context of teacher development.

"In one course, for example, I use literary texts to examine issues of diversity, both locally and internationally. It's a way to live vicariously in other ethnocultural worlds. We have the opportunity of exploring the immigrant and refugee experience through the eyes of those who necessarily live between two worlds."

Feuerverger, whose husband is also an academic, currently directs a multicultural literacy project in Toronto schools where she has developed a teacher's guide and video programs.

As well, she is the principal investigator of a research study titled Educational Stories from the Margins: A Reflective Inquiry into the Immigrant/Refugee Experience in Toronto and Montreal.

During the late 1980s, she completed a qualitative study of the attitudes of Toronto's Jewish community toward language maintenance and cultural identity.

In this case study, she examined how the learning of Hebrew can provide Jewish students with a feeling of identity and place.

As she put it: "For some, it signified a cultural and/or religious quest for survival. For others, it was a bridge to a more valued target language community and a way of life. For still others, Hebrew was a romantic escape. But for all, it was a symbol of deep attachment to their ancestors and history."

NO TO BLOODSHED
NO TO OCCUPATION

CANADIAN FRIENDS OF PEACE NOW supports the recent Joint Declaration by prominent Israelis and Palestinians calling for a negotiated solution to the conflict. The following is an abridged version of the declaration.

We, the undersigned Israelis and Palestinians, are meeting in the most difficult of circumstances for both our peoples. We come together to call for an end to bloodshed, an end to occupation, an urgent return to negotiations and the realization of peace between our peoples. We refuse to give in to the ongoing deterioration of our situation, and the real possibility that we may all be drowned in a sea of mutual hostility.

In spite of everything we still believe that we have a partner for peace and that a negotiated solution to the conflict between our peoples is possible. Mistakes have been made on all sides. But time is not on either of our sides. The longer we wait, the more innocent blood will be spilt and the more hope will be eroded.

We must move urgently to re-build our partnership, to end the de-humanization of the other, and to revive the option of a just peace that holds out promise for our respective futures.

The way forward lies in the implementation of UNSCR 242 and 338, leading to a 2-State solution based on the 1967 borders, with Israel and Palestine living side-by-side and their respective capitals in Jerusalem. Fair and just solutions can be found to all outstanding issues. They should embody the aspirations to statehood of both peoples, Jewish and Palestinian, and should build on the progress made between November 1999 and January 2001.

The immediate need is for the full and accurate implementation of the Recommendations of the Mitchell Committee, including: the cessation of violence, a total freeze on settlement activity, the implementation of outstanding agreements and a return to negotiations. This process should be monitored by an objective third party.

We see it as our duty to work together, each of us in our own community, to put a halt to the deterioration in our relations, to rebuild trust, belief and the hope for peace.

U of T Muslim students funded to vilify Israel

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The Jewish Students' Union (JSU) at the University of Toronto is considering launching a formal grievance over a $1,000 grant that will allow a busload of Muslim students to take part in an anti-Israel rally in Montreal.

In late August, the university's Student Administrative Council (SAC) voted 16 to four (with nine abstentions) to allot the money to the Muslim Students' Association, which will use it to bus members to a rally denouncing "Israeli colonialism" planned for Sept. 15 near Concordia University in Montreal.

Officials at Concordia recently denied permission for the rally to take place on university property, fearing "the risk of confrontation and possible violence" [CJN, Aug. 30]. The organizers, Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights, said they expected some 20,000 demonstrators to march to the U.S. and Israeli consulates in Montreal.

The rally is still scheduled, but at a location away from the university.

The JSU will voice its concern over the $1,000 grant with the University of Toronto's equities commissioner and the SAC, said Aaron Kasman, president of the JSU.

Jewish students at U of T feel "very strongly that the SAC should not fund or in any way sponsor initiatives that disseminate propaganda or are liable to incite hatred, specifically anti-Semitism and anti-Zionism," Kasman told The CJN.

The JSU is not ruling out filing a formal complaint with the university, he added.

The SAC is independent of the university and is not bound by university rules governing neutrality in foreign conflicts, said Jen Lockie, clubs commissioner of the SAC. "It is not based on politics," Lockie stated.

"But we very rarely take a stand," she added. Asked whether the SAC took a stand this time, she said, "No, we have not."

The SAC represents 33,000 fulltime undergraduate students, and is completely student-run, Lockie said. It is funded through student fees.

The grant to the Muslim students was voted on by the clubs commission, one of seven SAC commissions.

Jewish students at U of T "have to be sensitive to the fact that the JSU has also received funding from the SAC for Holocaust Education Week and to send students to conferences," remarked Zac Kaye, executive director of Jewish Campus Services. However, the grant to the Muslim students "is totally unsavoury, and we will express our opposition."

Len Rudner, director of community relations for the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress, agreed it was "not appropriate" for the SAC to fund the Muslim students' trip.

Past Muslim and Arab-led rallies in Canada have likened Israel to a Nazi state, Rudner noted, adding that the recent World Conference Against Racism in Durban is fuelling emotions.

"Passions are running so high that the potential for this [rally] to turn into a forum of violence and hatred of Jews is tangible," Rudner said.

According to Kasman, the JSU tried to work with the Muslim Students' Association last year to draft a statement of peace, and was offered funds from the SAC. Those funds were refused after the Muslim students turned down the offer, Kasman said.

Asked about Jewish-Muslim relations on campus, Kasman said, "As of right now, there aren't any relations."

Hebrew University one-year program proves a real eye-opener

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — One of the major lessons that Lawrence Clarfield learned this past year in Israel is that there are no easy answers.

Clarfield, a York university student, recently returned from the one-year program at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem.

When he first arrived in Israel, the situation was relatively peaceful and his opinions were straightforward – Clarfield was supportive of most Israeli policies.

However, being in Israel allowed the students at the Hebrew University to question and debate the situation in very real terms.

"Classes with incredible teachers and students from all over the world opened my eyes to different perspectives," Clarfield said.

At the end of school days, he found himself involved in emotionally charged discussions with the Arab and Israeli students in the dorms. Sometimes the debates became intense.

"Listening to other points of views made me start to think that something is wrong here on both sides," Clarfield said.

"Many of the students began to change their opinions and I began to see Israel differently.

"Not that I would ever justify Palestinian terrorism, but I did begin to wonder about the inequities and poverty that exists in Gaza and the West Bank."

And then the terrorism began to have a very real impact on his day- to-day life.

"Early on in the year, we were riding on the bus to go shopping in Machane Yehuda and my friend's cell phone began to ring.

"His mother was calling from Canada. She had just heard that a bomb had gone off in Machane Yehuda and she wanted to know where her son was."

At that moment, cell phones began to ring all over the bus and traffic came to a stop, Clarfield said. "We were still far enough away from the market not to be affected. But we began to experience the tension in very real terms."

Lawrence Clarfield

After that, the bomb went off at the Tel Aviv discotheque.

At that point, many of the students' political views began to change again, he noted.

"Even the most left-wing students began to question the possibility of making peace with the Palestinians."

In many ways the students felt confused and helpless about the situation and found some comfort in the heated debates that took place on the campus.

Having close friends helped him through the most emotional moments – good humour seemed to break even the most tense discussions, Clarfield said.

"I made friends with students from all over the world – including the Arab and Israeli students who were there.

"As much as Israelis may have a reputation of being rude," Clarfield discovered that "when you get to know them they are incredibly warm, supportive and helpful."

Clarfield's political views may have changed over the year, but his support of Israel strengthened.

"I think that it's important that people educate themselves and not just believe what they read in the Toronto Star or the Globe and Mail."

Throughout it all, Clarfield never thought of leaving.

Over the course of the year, everyone really came together and friendships were made that will last a lifetime, he said.

"While we were on campus, the university seemed to promote a level of peaceful coexistence, so that it never felt that there was any danger," he noted.

However, Clarfield knew that at the end of the year he had a ticket to leave the country while many of his friends did not.

Internment of Jewish refugees at Fort Lennox recalled

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

ST-PAUL-de-l'ÎLE-AUX-NOIX, Que. — Irwin Block, 86, walked around the old stone barracks of the former British fort on this small island with a certain proprietorial authority. They were, after all, his first home in Canada.

Block was one of about 300 German and Austrian Jewish men and boys interned here during World War II because they were nationals of enemy countries.

He points to the second floor of one of the larger buildings in this compound, where he slept in a dormitory full of bunk beds from July 1940 to November 1942, when he was released.

Block, a retired chemical manufacturer, has returned to this island in the Richelieu River about 12 km from the U.S. border for the first commemoration of a little-known chapter in the fort's long history. Fort Lennox, a 10-minute ferry ride from the village, was built by the British in 1819 to defend against a feared American invasion.

The fort is a national historic site visited by thousands of tourists and schoolchildren every year. Until now, though, none of them had learned that this had been the scene of a less-than-glorious episode in Canada's war effort: the imprisonment of some 2,500 Jewish refugees from Nazism from 1940 to 1943.

Île-aux-Noix was one of more than one dozen internment camps mainly in Quebec, but also New Brunswick and Ontario, where they were incarcerated.

Parks Canada, at the urging of some of the surviving internees – most of whom are in their 80s and 90s now – recently held a special day to remember those times.

Block, a native of a German town near the French border, was arrested during Kristallnacht in November 1938 in Frankfurt, and spent four months in the Buchenwald concentration camp. He was let go after he secured a visa to Guatemala, only to return to his house to find it had been ransacked and the visa gone.

He was was able to get a visa to England where he landed in May 1939. After the war broke out, Block was among thousands of German and Austrian nationals rounded up and interned in Britain. Following the fall of France, Britain – fearful of an imminent German invasion – shipped the internees off to Canada and Australia.

Before arriving at Île-aux-Noix, Block spent time at camps in Fredericton, N.B., and Trois-Rivières, where he was thrown together with German military prisoners of war.

The fact that Jewish refugees were being held while the Canadian government decided whether they were, in fact, security risks was no secret at the time.

Block, who came with his son Joseph, brought with him a yellowed magazine insert from the old Montreal Standard dated Feb. 7, 1942.

The paper published a photo spread of internees making camouflage nets for 30 cents a day, repairing shoes, putting on a theatrical production of Oliver Cromwell, skating on the frozen moat around the fort, and lounging in their bunks reading papers.

Readers could also see the internees electing their own representatives to act as liaison with the camp's military commanders. Block remembers that ORT had a training school, since torn down, in the field in the middle of the compound where internees could learn a trade.

But this was no holiday; the internees lived behind barbed wire and under the watchful eye of armed guards positioned in towers. They were expected to follow military discipline, marching on order and keeping quiet unless spoken to.

When they first arrived, the internees wore dark blue uniforms with a red circle on the back of the shirts and red stripe on the pants legs.

Things did become more relaxed after it was determined that the internees were, indeed, refugees and not spies. They were not, however, allowed to leave the camp until they had found Canadian citizens as sponsors, a requirement that accounts for their length of their stay.

In fact, it took two years from the time the internees were officially deemed no threat until all had left Fort Lennox.

Absurd as it seems today, Block is not bitter that a victim of Nazism was treated in Canada as a suspected fifth columnist for Germany. "I was happy to be here; the alternative would have been worse," he said.

On this commemoration day, Parks Canada officials gave talks on the internees' experience at Camp I, as it was known, and showed a short CBC video entitled The Secret of Île-aux-Noix that included interviews with three former internees.

There was also a small exhibition of artifacts from the period, such as newspapers of the day and a badly deteriorated Jewish prayer book that had evidently been buried on the island by an internee and unearthed years later by a Parks Canada archeologist. The klezmer band Mazik gave an outdoor concert.

Parks Canada official Annissa Laplante related that on July 15, 1940, the day the 300 refugees arrived at the nearby railway station, it was raining heavily. The barge could take only 35 across to the island at a time, which became an all day ordeal. It took another day to get all their luggage across, but much of what was worthwhile was looted while sitting on the dock.

"The local people thought these were Nazi prisoners so they apparently felt less guilty stealing from them," Laplante said.

She said Fort Lennox was used as an internment camp because it was far from a heavily populated area and on an island. People simply didn't want the "enemy" in their backyard.

"Also, in the little villages in the area, everyone knew everyone else, so it would be easier to catch any escapees," she said.

The fort was in poor condition when they arrived. It had not been in use since 1870 and had not been kept up in the interim. There were no toilets and there were a shortage of beds when the internees arrived. The internees themselves had to pitch in to make the camp livable.

Laplante said that among the internees could be found persons from all walks of life: lawyers, musicians, teachers, shoemakers. Each contributed what they could to make camp life as bearable as possible. The internees ran a canteen and invested the profits to improve their conditions, she said.

During their free time, the internees organized classes and concerts and plays. They had the opportunity to learn a trade with ORT or finish a university degree through co-operation with McGill University. A synagogue was established and kosher food prepared. The Jewish calendar was observed through the year.

"Still life was boring, especially in winter when they were particularly isolated and confined," she said.

Those still in the camp by 1943 were getting angry and desperate, Laplante said. There is at least one record of an attempted suicide.

The camp was closed for good in October of that year, with those remaining transferred to Hull. They, too, were released soon after that, she said. Laplante said Parks Canada hopes to make this commemoration an annual event.

Menus can be elegant and easy to prepare

BY NORENE GILLETZ
Special to The CJN

Rosh Hashanah is quickly approaching, and cooks everywhere are comparing menu ideas and searching for new, interesting recipes for the upcoming High Holy Days. Look no further. You'll find over 300 easy, elegant recipes plus 70 colour photographs in The Kosher Palette (Joseph Kushner Hebrew Academy, Livingston, N.J., $45.95 Cdn).

The recipes, which have been double and triple-tested, are designated as meat, dairy and pareve, which is very helpful for the kosher cook. The index is comprehensive and well-organized. The holiday section contains recipes for all the major Jewish holidays, with suggested menu ideas and a description of each holiday. Here is their description of Rosh Hashanah:

"Rosh Hashanah, the Jewish New Year, is one of the most significant and joyful of holidays. As Jewish families everywhere look forward to a sweet year full of blessings, we dip challah and apple slices into honey. We eat round challah and sweet dishes such as tzimmes and honey cake, all symbolic of our hopes for a sweet, full (round) and happy new year.

"In addition to the roundness and sweetness of the coin-shaped carrots in tzimmes, wordplay on the Yiddish word merren, which means both to increase and carrots, provides another source for the idea of eating tzimmes on Rosh Hashanah."

Bring sweetness into the coming year by sharing and enjoying festive sweet foods with family and friends. Here are some wonderful new recipes to add to your recipe repertoire. Enjoy!

HONEY AND HERB VEAL ROAST

1 cup beer or ginger ale
1 cup honey
½ cup Dijon mustard
¼ cup vegetable oil
2 tbsp. onion powder
1½ tsp. crushed dried rosemary
1 tsp. salt
1 tsp. garlic powder
¼ tsp. black pepper
3 lb. boneless veal roast

Combine beer, honey, mustard, oil, onion powder, rosemary, salt, garlic powder and pepper in a large plastic zip-top bag. Add veal, tossing gently to coat. Refrigerate for 3 hours, tossing occasionally.

Preheat oven to 350. Remove veal from marinade, reserving marinade. Place veal in a large roasting pan. Bake 1½ to 2 hours, basting occasionally, or until desired degree of doneness.

Place reserved marinade in a saucepan over medium-high heat. Bring mixture to a boil; boil for 5 minutes. Serve over roast. Makes 8 servings.

CARROT KUGEL (Pareve)

This kid-friendly recipe can be made ahead or can also be made into muffins. Insert paper liners into muffin tins. Pour batter to fill each compartment ¾ full. Bake 30 minutes. Makes 20 to 22 muffins.

4 large carrots, cut into 3- to 4-inch pieces vegetable cooking spray
1 cup all-purpose flour
½ cup firmly packed brown sugar
½ cup sugar
1½ tsp. baking powder
½ cup oil (or ½ cup applesauce)
2 large eggs
1 tsp. vanilla extract

Combine carrots and water to cover in a large saucepan over high heat. Boil 25 minutes or until carrots are tender. Drain and place in a large mixing bowl. Mash carrots with a fork.

Preheat oven to 350. Coat a 9-inch non-stick springform pan with non-stick spray. (You can also use a tart pan with a removable bottom. Be sure sides are at least 2 inches high.) Set aside.

To the carrots, add flour, sugars, baking powder, oil, eggs and vanilla. Beat at medium speed with an electric mixer until well blended (can also be mixed by hand). Do not overbeat so batter will have small pieces of carrot for texture.

Pour mixture into prepared pan. Bake for 45 minutes, or until a toothpick inserted in the centre comes out clean. Cut into wedges. Makes 12 servings.

4 ½ tbsp. margarine
4 ½ tbsp. all-purpose flour
1½ cups non-dairy creamer
1½ cups mayonnaise
9 large eggs
1 (1½-oz.) package onion soup mix
1¼ lbs. fresh or frozen broccoli
1¼ lbs. fresh or frozen cauliflower
1¼ lbs. fresh or canned carrots
crumbled corn flakes

Preheat oven to 350. Heat margarine in a saucepan over medium-high heat. Add flour, whisking until blended. Gradually whisk in non-dairy creamer until thickened. Remove from heat and stir in mayonnaise, eggs and soup mix; set aside.

Cook broccoli in boiling water to cover until tender; drain. Place broccoli in the food processor fitted with a knife blade; process until almost smooth. Stir in 2 cups of egg mixture. Pour broccoli mixture into a lightly greased 9-inch springform pan. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes.

Cook cauliflower in boiling water to cover until tender; drain. Place cauliflower in the food processor fitted with a knife blade; process until almost smooth. Stir in 2 cups of egg mixture. Spread evenly over broccoli layer. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes.

Helpful suggestions for that pre-fast meal

By RIVKA TAL
Special to The CJN

On Yom Kippur, we wish each other a Gmar Chatimah Tovah: to be sealed for good in the Book of Life. For the many people fasting and spending almost the entire day at the synagogue in prayer, we also wish each other an easy fast.

The fast is rarely easy, but modern science has given us lots of hints to ease our way through these 25 hours: The most important advice: on the day before the fast, drink lots of water! Avoid drinks or food that cause your body to get rid of water. Such food and drinks include alcohol, tea, coffee and chocolate. And avoid consuming too much salt.

Try to reduce or eliminate caffeine from your diet in the days or weeks before Yom Kippur to avoid that infamous Yom Kippur headache.

On the day preceding the fast, we may nosh all day, but the final meal before the fast is the most important one: Include some foods high in oils and fats. Salads and other high fibre foods that are so important in one's normal diet should be de-emphasized for the pre-fast meal, since they travel quickly through the digestive system. Fruit is worthwhile since it carries a lot of water in a "time-release" form. Latest research points to seasonal grapes and watermelon as great additions to your pre-fast meal.

Here are some menu suggestions for that meal.

KREPLACH

Dough:
2 cups flour
½ tsp. salt
3 tbsp. oil
2 egg yolks
½ cup water
1½ tsp. baking powder

Filling:
1 onion, diced
2 tbsp. oil
1 cup chopped cooked ground beef
1 tsp. salt
¼ tsp. pepper
1 egg
1 tbsp. breadcrumbs

To make dough, combine flour, salt and oil in a large bowl. In a separate bowl, beat egg yolks, water and baking powder. Add to flour mixture. Knead and roll out into a 9-inch square. Dough may be hard to roll out, but forge ahead! Cut into 3-inch squares. Repeat with remaining dough.

Make the filling. Saute onion in oil. Add ground beef and brown for 5 minutes. Remove from heat and cool. Add salt, pepper, egg and breadcrumbs and mix well.

Place 1 tsp. filling in centre of each kreplach square. Moisten edges with water. Fold each in half to form a triangle. Press edges to seal. Pull bottom corners of triangle down and overlap slightly. Moisten one corner with water; pinch to seal.

Place in boiling water. Cook about 15 minutes until kreplach float to the top. Remove from pot with slotted spoon and serve in soup.

CHICKEN KIEV

½ cup unsalted margarine, softened
½ cup chopped onion
1 tsp. dried parsley
¼ tsp. pepper
6 chicken breast halves, skinned and boned
1 egg, beaten with 1 teaspoon water
1¼ cup seasoned flour or breadcrumbs (approximately)
1 tbsp. oil

Combine margarine, onion, parsley and pepper thoroughly. Shape mixture into a stick; cover and chill until firm. Place each chicken breast half between 2 sheets of waxed paper. Pound with a wooden mallet or rolling pin to ¼-inch thickness.

Preheat oven to 350. Grease a shallow, ovenproof dish. Divide margarine mixture into 6 even portions. Place a portion in the centre of each chicken breast. Roll as for a jelly roll and tuck in sides of chicken. Press to seal and secure with a wooden pick.

Dip each piece of chicken into egg beaten with water, then roll in seasoned flour. Line up rolls in prepared baking dish. Sprinkle with oil. Bake for 1¼-1½ hours or until chicken tests done. Yield: 6 main-dish portions.

RED CABBAGE SLAW

1 2-lb. head red cabbage
⅓ cup red wine vinegar
2 tbsp. lemon juice
2 tbsp. sugar
½ tsp. caraway seeds (optional)
salt and pepper to taste
1 cup canned corn, drained

Core cabbage and slice into fine ribbons. Place in a large bowl. Add remaining ingredients except corn and toss to combine thoroughly. Cover and refrigerate for at least 4 hours or overnight. Sprinkle corn over slaw immediately prior to serving. Yield: 6-8 servings.

ROASTED HONEYED POTATOES

8 medium potatoes, peeled
⅛ tsp. salt
5 tbsp. oil
¼ cup honey

Place potatoes in a large pot of water over high heat. Bring to a boil. Remove potatoes and drain immediately. Lightly grease an ovenproof baking dish. Sprinkle with salt and spoon oil over. Bake at 350 for about 20 minutes. Top with dollops of honey and bake an additional 20 minutes or until fork-tender. Yield: 8 servings.

Cook carrots in boiling water to cover until tender; drain. Place carrots in the food processor fitted with a knife blade; process until smooth. Stir in remaining 1½ cups egg mixture. Spread evenly over cauliflower layer. Sprinkle top with crumbled corn flakes. Bake for 20 to 25 minutes.

Release carefully from the springform pan and serve. Makes 12 to 14 servings.

ROASTED ROOT VEGETABLES (Pareve)

This healthy side dish is easy since, with the exception of the turnips, you do not have to peel the vegetables. Leftovers are just as good, if not better, on the second day.

2 leeks
5 cloves garlic, unpeeled
5 carrots, cut into 2-in. pieces
4 onions, cut into 1-in. pieces
2 turnips, peeled and cut into chunks
1 parsnip, cut into chunks
2 sweet potatoes, unpeeled and cut into chunks
2 potatoes, unpeeled and cut into chunks
2 acorn squash, unpeeled and cut into chunks
⅓ cup olive oil kosher salt

Preheat oven to 400. Wash leeks thoroughly and cut off top outer leaves. Cut off roots, leaving bulb intact to hold leaves together. Place leeks on the bottom of a very large, shallow roasting pan that has been coated with oil. (Leeks should remain on the bottom to avoid burning.)

Add remaining vegetables and olive oil, tossing to coat. Sprinkle with salt. Bake uncovered for 1½ to 2 hours or until vegetables are tender. Stir occasionally to distribute oil. Although the vegetables are fragrant and delicious alone, you can season them with sage, rosemary or thyme, if desired. Makes 12 to 18 servings.

Ottawa music program admits young Israeli artists

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Young Israeli musicians can now participate in the Young Artist Program of the National Arts Centre.

The Pinchas Zukerman Music Education Fund was established earlier this year as part of the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation by a group of donors who share Zukerman's passion for music education. Zukerman was the founder of the Young Artist Program, an intensive training school held each summer for top young musicians.

As a young boy in Israel, Zukerman received financial assistance from the America-Israel Cultural Foundation, and he has said that support was very important to his musical development. He has therefore made it a priority to help aspiring young musicians wherever his travels have taken him.

The participants in this summer's Young Artist Program attended the launch of the Pinchas Zukerman Music Education Fund held at Freiman Hall, University of Ottawa. The event, presented by the Ottawa Jewish Community Foundation, was held in co-operation with the Embassy of Israel, the Canada-Israel Cultural Foundation and the Young Artists Program of the National Arts Centre.

Two of this year's scholarship recipients, pianist Dmitri Shteinberg and violinist Daniel Guedes treated the audience to performances of Beethoven's Sonata No. 3 and Ravel's Tzigane. The third recipient, Shmuel Katz, was touring South America with the New York Philharmonic, but upon his return to Ottawa, he gave a performance with Shteinberg at Hillel Lodge Home for the Aged.

The ambassador of Israel to Canada, Haim Divon, was present, as were many of the founding donors and music lovers.

Zukerman presented crystal sculptures to the founding donors in appreciation of their support.

Those donors include the Rita and Frank Engels Family Fund, the Music Education Fund in Memory of Yigal Harband, the Myrna and Norman Barwin Endowment Fund, the Lawrence and Audrey Freiman (CICF) Fund and Sara and Zeev Vered. A capital gift was made by Louise and Harvey Glatt to provide scholarships for this year's Israeli students. In addition, the fund has received support from the Alexandor Family Fund, Dorothy and Herb Nadolny and Vera and Leslie Klein.

Ruth Berger, foundation board member and chair of the Zukerman fund committee, remarked on the presence of 90-year-old Audrey Freiman whose late husband Lawrence Freiman, for whom the hall was named, was instrumental in establishing the National Arts Centre and was the first chairman of the NAC board.

"It is absolutely perfect that we are celebrating the launch of the Pinchas Zukerman Music Education Fund in Freiman Hall," Berger said.

New Reform congregation under way in Barrie

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

BARRIE, Ont. — The members and officers have chosen the name Am Shalom for the new Reform congregation here, and they hope to start building in 2003.

"The most surprising thing is that we are getting support from the non-Jewish community," said Robin Hadfield, president. "Six of the seven calls we had after a notice appeared in the local paper that we had chosen a name came from seniors who were not Jewish and said it was the policy of their church to support us. They all gave donations to Am Shalom. We have a large interfaith group here."

The Jewish community of Barrie is growing quickly, Hadfield said, indicating that it now has 455 families, compared to 300 seven years ago.

"Most of the newcomers are young families with children, middle class – though we have some professionals too, doctors and lawyers. They like the lifestyle here, just 50 miles north of Toronto where their roots are. I am sure there is an economic factor to their move as well," he said.

A total of $400,000 – $200,000 locally, and $200,000 from summer residents – has been raised toward the $1-million objective, even though the kick-off to the main campaign for members has not yet begun.

The land in south Barrie on which Am Shalom will be built was donated by Henry Bernik, a property developer in Toronto who attended a one-room school in the area when his family lived in Barrie. A plaque on the new synagogue will be dedicated in his honour. Bernik offered the congregation the land after he read a story in The CJN about the Reform synagogue in Niagara Falls giving them a Torah.

The fund-raising campaign will continue during the High Holy Day Services, Sept. 17 and 18, to be held in the Shiba Shrine and led by Rabbi Bernard Baskin of Hamilton.

The new congregation is affiliated with the Canadian Council for Reform Judaism (CCRJ), which is part of the United American Hebrew Congregations (UAHC), the Reform umbrella group in North America.

Am Shalom has a core membership of 60 families, but expects that it will reach out to the many Jewish families in the Georgian Triangle resort area who are waiting for the new synagogue to be built. Many summer residents of the Lake Simcoe and north vacation area come to Am Shalom for the High Holy Days.

A Hebrew school, attended by 30 students, is held every Sunday at the Barrie YMCA. Its enrolment has increased by 20 percent since it started, Hadfield said.

He said they have received support from Michael Soberman, director of community development for the Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, and from a youth outreach group of 75 young people who keep in contact with Jewish teenagers in Barrie.

Other officers are Erick Allen, vice-president, and Dr. Mitchell Whyne, treasurer.

For more information, call Robin Hadfield, 705-424-6788.

Tfillah and Tehillim Day

L'maan B'nos Yisrael International, an organization dedicated to helping the plight of agunot has declared Sept. 17, erev Rosh Hashanah, to be the third annual worldwide Tfillah and Tehillim Day.

"Jews all over the world are urged to join together and pray for mercy for agunot, their children, and those who are prevented from being born as a direct result of the agunah crisis," says Mattie Klein, founder and president of the New York-based organization.

Suggested prayers include Tfillah L'Agunah written by Rabbi Mordechai Tendler and psalms 120 to 134.

Klein said that the organization has also declared an Agunah Get Day for Sept. 23.

"[We] must encourage recalcitrant husbands to do tshuvah and give their agunah wives a get before Yom Kippur.

"Batei Din are ready and prepared in various locations around the world to facilitate the get process, and L'maan B'nos Yisrael International will cover the cost of the sofer in an attempt to participate in this great mitzvah," says Klein.

For information call Klein at 718-338-0833 or visit the Web site at www.lbyi.org.

Leadership at Durban questioned

Scene in Ottawa
By G.K. SIMCOE

Sometimes, those of us who have a special fondness for the Jewish community and the causes it espouses have to shake our heads with incredulity. How can a community so accomplished in so many areas continue to display such ineptitude in the realm of politics and public relations?

There is no doubt that Canada should have withdrawn from the Durban conference. The challenge, however, was avoiding the perception that had Canada done so it would have been only as a response to Jewish pressure. Such a perception would be harmful to Jewish interests.

In an attempt to help the Jewish community learn from its errors – and its shrill, if heartfelt, demands that Canada should have bolted the conference surely was an error – I offer the following.

First, throughout the process leading up to Durban, as well as at the conference itself, the Canadian position was articulated with the greatest of clarity – including an unequivocal condemnation of Yasser Arafat's speech to the conference. Thus, Canadian Jews could never have been in doubt concerning the government's orientation and should have been able to draw some reassurance from that knowledge.

Second, Canada had invested literally millions of dollars through grants to various groups who participated in the conference. These stakeholders,whose issues are far removed from Middle East politics, were just as passionate about their concerns as Jews were about Israel. No government wants to be in a position where it appears to be placing the interests of one group over all the others. For these groups, the conference represented a unique opportunity to get their message out.

Canada's early departure would have rendered all of their efforts futile, and regardless of the reasons motivating the exit, even the most compelling, such a development would have been hard to swallow.

Assuming that Foreign Affairs Minister John Manley really did want Canada to leave early, he was facing two problems. One was the perception that the government would have been simply kowtowing to Jewish pressure; the other, that Canada's departure would have been "blamed" on the Jews.

A more constructive approach would have been to limit public commentary to concern and frustration over the "kidnapping" of the conference by forces intent on superimposing their own parochial agenda on an otherwise noble exercise. Moreover, it would not have hurt for the community to have offered some praise for the efforts of the government to rescue the conference from those who sought to do politically what suicide bombers have tried to do physically.

The agitation concerning the UN conference in Durban, was understandable. However, the leadership of the Jewish community, indeed any community, had a responsibility to overcome the temptation to respond to the conference on an emotional level and to plot a course that would truly advance the community's agenda.

Marxist group has anti-Jewish history

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A Supreme Court judge in the remote town of Yellowknife has given a green light to the extradition to Germany of an alleged Marxist terrorist, who was living quietly as an inn-keeper.

Walter Lothar Ebke, 47, is alleged to have been a member of the left-wing group, Revolutionary Cells, from 1985 to at least 1993, according to German prosecutors. He was identified by a suspected accomplice named Tarek Mousli, who told German authorities Ebke was involved in four terror actions. Two of the alleged actions involved performing surveillance for leftist gunmen.

Ebke's lawyer said he will appeal the ruling.

The Revolutionary Cells, also known by its German acronym RZ, originated in the early 1970s when many European youths joined radical left-wing groups. According to a recent report in The New Republic magazine, the Revolutionary Cells assisted the PLO's Black September in its attack on Israeli athletes at the 1972 Munich Olympics. Eleven athletes were killed.

In 1976, "the Revolutionary Cells, acting on behalf of jailed Palestinian terrorists, hijacked an Air France plane, took it to Entebbe in Uganda, and went about arranging a 'selection' of passengers, Jews on one side, non-Jews on the other, with the Jews slated for execution," the magazine reported.

The planned murder of Jewish passengers was averted when an Israeli commando unit, led by Jonathan Netanyahu, staged a raid on Entebbe. They killed the terrorists and freed all the hostages but one. Jonathan Netanyahu, brother to future prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, was killed in the raid.

The magazine also reported that a onetime RZ member, Hans-Joachim Klein, offered the startling news in 1977 that terrorists were planning to murder the leaders of the Jewish communities of Berlin and Frankfurt.

Klein, described in the article as a"penitent terrorist," became disillusioned by the group's violence and anti-Jewish animus. In 1975 he had joined arch-terrorist Carlos to attack, in the name of the Arab revolution, a meeting in Vienna of OPEC oil ministers; three men were killed.

Ebke allegedly joined the RZ years after these deadly RZ attacks.

Enrolment in Winnipeg Jewish school system stable

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Enrolment in Winnipeg's Jewish day school programs has not changed in the past two years.

For most of the day schools the numbers are the same, while the Board of Jewish Education's Grey Academy reports a slight dip.

The Grey Academy consists of the Shore elementary School and Joseph Wolinsky Collegiate, the only Jewish high school in the city.

Together, the two schools have the largest number of Jewish day school students.

The enrolment this year stands at 637 at the beginning of September, down from 660 last year. The drop in numbers, says BJE business manager Jack Cipilinsky, is due mainly to the fact that last year's Grade 12 graduating class of 37 was much larger than usual.

"Those numbers are hard to replace," he says, citing demographic trends in the community.

"We only have 50 to 60 kids coming into our junior kindergarten program this year. In the past we used to have 70 to 80 children enrolled."

At the junior high school level, a significant portion of the BJE students leave for the private school, St. Johns-Ravenscourt School, or public school.

A number of students also leave Joseph Wolinsky after Grade 9 to attend the University of Winnipeg collegiate. A third or more of the students in the collegiate program are Jewish.

The Shore Elementary School's main competition for Jewish students in south Winnipeg is the Hebrew bilingual program at Brock Corydon Elementary School.

Principal Laurie Tighe reports that student numbers are about 170, roughly where they have been sitting for several years.

As Cipilinsky points out however, the younger grades are showing smaller enrolments.

The kindergarten class has 12 students, the same as last year's kindergarten class. Tighe notes that some parents hold their children back until Grade 1 because the kindergarten is just a half-day program. Some parents opt for day care instead of kindergarten.

Brock Corydon's Grade 1 class is only 18 this year while the Grade 2 group stands at 24.

The third and newest south Winnipeg Jewish day school is Ohr haTorah, which has classes at the Herzlia Synagogue.

Going into its fourth year, Ohr Hatorah has about 30 students, again a figure little changed from last year.

This year, the school will have a Grade 4 program for the one student in that grade. There are four children signed up for kindergarten, with another four whose parents are still considering registering them.

Margaret Park Elementary School's Hebrew Bilingual program, the Jewish day school in north Winnipeg, has an enrolment of 101 students this year, the same number as last year.

The kindergarten registration, at 17, is one less than last year's class but better than the 10 to 12 students enrolled for kindergarten in 1998 and 1999. Margaret Park and Brock Corydon are both public schools which offer half-day Hebrew programs.

Chabad also has a north Winnipeg day school but with a very small number of students, mainly from Chabad-affiliated families.

Homecoming held in Glace Bay

By JULIE ZATZMAN
Special to The CJN

GLACE BAY, N.S. — About 500 people gathered and reminisced during a joyous Kum A-Haym here last month.

They came from all over North America, with some travelling from other continents, to immerse themselves in the history of what was once a vibrant Jewish community.

A large number of those at the homecoming had actually never been to Glace Bay. They were drawn by the stories their parents and grandparents had shared with them of life in the coal town and the many colourful characters who were part of its Jewish community.

The Kum A-Haym was held to mark the 100th anniversary of Glace Bay's Congregation Sons of Israel. The European-style synagogue the congregation built in 1902 is believed to be one of the last of its type still in use in Canada today.

Like many immigrants who settled in Cape Breton in the early 1900s, eastern European Jews came at the invitation of the former Dominion Coal Company, which offered them free passage. The company was expanding its coal operations and desperately needed workers.

However, the Jewish immigrants had few skills suitable for coal mining. Instead, they became pedlars, selling what they could carry on their backs as they tramped through the Cape Breton countryside, learning the language of their new home. Many were soon surprised to discover the new language they had learned was not English, but Gaelic.

The cosmopolitan atmosphere of the new town provided a safe haven from the oppression the Jewish settlers had suffered in Czarist Russia. But it was the helping hand extended by Jewish merchants to struggling miners during a series of bitter labour disputes that resulted in enduring warm relations between the Jews and their gentile neighbours.

The Jewish community flourished in the 1930s, '40s and '50s, reaching nearly 100 families at its peak. It had its own women's organizations, youth clubs, sports teams, musicians and theatre productions. Jewish merchants dominated Glace Bay's business districts.

The life of the congregation has closely followed that of the coal industry. When coal mines in the town began to close in the 1950s, young Jewish people began to leave for education or employment and never moved back. Now there are no mines operating in Glace Bay and the Jewish community has dwindled to fewer than 20 people, most of whom are elderly.

One of the goals of the homecoming was to start a fund to provide for the ongoing maintenance of Glace Bay's Jewish cemetery after there is no longer a Jewish community in the town.

But the four-day homecoming was a joyous event, with music, prayer, laughter, good food and warmth.

"It was a time for families. It was so wonderful to be there with our families and in some cases, to meet family members we didn't know. That was the pinnacle of the whole thing," said Shirley Chernin, chair of the event's six-person planning committee.

Dr. Sheva Medjuck, president of the Atlantic Jewish Council, put the Kum A-Haym into perspective.

"I think you have to accept what has happened and remember what this community was... The cup is not half empty, it's really half full. And when you see the kind of spirit that still exists here, I think you have to be filled with a sense that there's still a lot of positive life left. So I think Glace Bay, particularly with the Kum A-Haym, has again shown us there is a vibrant Jewish spirit here and, although they are small in numbers, they certainly make it up in spirit."

Rookie Winnipeg MP brings experience, enthusiasm to job

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Anita Neville is none too pleased that the House of Commons is beginning its fall session on the first day of Rosh Hashanah.

"I always have the family over for yom tov," says the rookie member of Parliament for Winnipeg South Centre. "I guess I will go to Ottawa after Rosh Hashanah, stay a couple of days and come back home for Yom Kippur. It's just another organizational challenge."

Anita Neville

OUR MPs

Neville thrives on challenges judging by her workload in Ottawa. She is a member of both the parliamentary standing committee on citizenship and immigration and the human resources development committee, two Liberal caucus committees that deal with women's issues, child care, and social policy and economic development. She also chairs the Manitoba Liberal caucus.

"I am finding this all very exciting and challenging," Neville says. "In all of my adult life, this has been one of the fastest learning curves I have been on. I am not new to politics, but being a member of Parliament has introduced me to a whole new group of people, procedures and issues."

Neville was elected in the general election last November to the seat that was vacated by Lloyd Axworthy, Canada's foreign minister before he stepped down, and Winnipeg's political "godfather" for much of his lengthy political career. Neville hastens to point out, however, that her election victory was no shoo-in in what has been traditionally a Liberal riding.

"We worked hard," she says. "We had a strong campaign team but a short campaign time. Both the Conservatives and the NDP were targeting this constituency and waged aggressive campaigns."

Politics has long been a passion for the former Anita Schwartz. At university, she majored in political science, and she was a school trustee in Winnipeg School Division No. 1 for 14 years, up until her election to Parliament. She ran unsuccessfully as a Liberal candidate in the 1995 provincial election. (In Manitoba, Liberals rarely win any seats at the provincial level.)

In addition to her position as a school trustee, Neville has served as an economic development consultant to the provincial government and as executive director of a government-funded employment and training program. She chaired the City of Winnipeg's co-ordinating committee for racial harmony and education, and served as an international observer of the elections in Bosnia in 1995.

In the Jewish community, she has been involved with the women's endowment committee of the Jewish Foundation and she is a member of the executive of the Canada-Israel Friendship Group. As an MP, she has had numerous meetings with members of the Canadian Jewish Congress, the Canada-Israel Committee and the Jewish Federation of Winnipeg, to discuss communal concerns.

As an MP, she noted, up to two-thirds of her time has been taken up with immigration matters. She has participated in hearings across the country with Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan, and accompanied Caplan on a 13-day Asian tour.

Over the summer, she has been kept busy in Winnipeg representing the government at openings and other functions.

One of Neville's priorities remains spending time with her daughters – Sarah, an actress in Toronto, Elisa, a lawyer in Winnipeg, and Jessica who recently received her master's degree in educational psychology.

"With my current schedule," she says, "the hardest thing is to keep up with friends and community."

Winnipeg film attaché connects with Hollywood

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — As director of film and cultural affairs for the city of Winnipeg, Kenny Boyce gets to attend all the cultural galas and hobnob with movie stars.

Being Jewish comes in handy, he says, because a lot of the Hollywood people he deals with, as well as those involved in Winnipeg's cultural scene, are also Jewish.

"It helps create an additional bond," says Boyce.

Boyce's position was created following recommendations made in a report on arts and culture in Winnipeg.

Boyce was plucked from his role as chair of the Osborne Business Improvement Zone for the new job, where he encourages and facilitates the growth of the city's booming film industry.

Three years ago, he reports, $17 million worth of movies were filmed in Winnipeg. This year, the industry will be worth $50 million, and in 2002, he forecasts that the industry will bring $100 million to Winnipeg's economy.

"Filmmaking is an exciting industry that employs a lot of people here," Boyce says. "Then there are the economic spin-offs for the hotels, rent-a-car agencies and second-hand clothing stores."

He says filmmakers are attracted to Winnipeg because the city gets a lot of sunshine and a guarantee of snow in winter. It also has lower production costs than anywhere else in Canada and skilled film crews.

Because word of mouth is very important in attracting actors, Boyce works to ensure that actors and production people all have a positive experience while filming here.

On the other hand, he notes, it is not hard to show visitors a good time in Winnipeg, with its wide range of cultural amenities and recreational activities.

Different stars have differing expectations, he says. Kiefer Sutherland, Dan Akroyd and Michael Moriarty, for example, like to go out every night and meet people. Rhea Perlman is content to return to her hotel every night, speak to husband Danny DeVito on the phone and have a quiet supper.

Some actors, such as Sam Neill and Patrick Swayze came with their wives.

Holly Hunter brought her dog. Boyce says that he became particularly friendly with Hunter and her Polish Jewish husband Yanusz Kaminski, an award-winning cinematographer (Saving Private Ryan, Schindler's List and Jerry Maguire). Hunter and Kaminski were introduced to each other by Steven Spielberg.

Boyce has also developed a close relationship with Michael Moriarty, former star of TV's Law and Order. He even helped Moriarty become a Canadian citizen. (One of Boyce's volunteer activities is helping refugees navigate through the Canadian immigration system.)

Another major part of Boyce's job involves distributing $2 million a year in grants through the Winnipeg Arts Council to arts and cultural groups in the city. Winnipeg is a city of culture, he points out. We buy more tickets per capita for art and cultural programs than Chicago, he notes.

"We have world-class ballet, the oldest professional theatre in Canada and the second largest regional theatre. There are 97 arts and cultural organizations in the downtown alone."

Boyce is currently involved in helping develop a new public art policy for Winnipeg that would have every new building as well as buildings under renovation incorporate art works as part of the development.

Boyce puts in long days at work. He is usually in the office by 7 a.m. Filmmaking and deals usually take place during the day, while the arts and cultural events are generally in the evenings and on weekends.

Though on call 24 hours a day, Boyce also likes to spend time with his dad Charlie, who just turned 83.

"I like taking Dad to different galleries and shows," Boyce says. "He makes friends everywhere. He taught me a lot."

Five Israelis killed by Arab terrorists

Jewish Telegraphic Agency

JERUSALEM — Calls for Israeli-Palestinian ceasefire talks were all but drowned out on the weekend by a series of Palestinian terror attacks.

On Sunday, a Palestinian suicide bomber struck in the train station in the Israeli coastal town of Nahariya, killing at least three Israelis and wounding more than 60. The station was packed with soldiers returning to base. Hamas claimed responsibility for the attack.

That same day, Palestinian gunmen opened fire on a van ferrying teachers to a school in the West Bank. A teacher and the driver were killed, and four other teachers injured.

In another incident Sunday, a car bomb exploded at a busy intersection in central Israel near the city of Netanya. The Palestinian driver of the car, which was waiting at a red light, was killed in the explosion.

Police speculated that the driver was heading to Netanya, the scene of several previous attacks.

Israel retaliated for the Palestinian attacks with helicopter missile strikes Sunday in four West Bank cities. The helicopters hit two empty offices of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah faction near Ramallah and a government building in Jericho. Helicopters also struck the Palestinian police headquarters near Jenin, while Israeli tank shells hit a security post in Nablus.

A day earlier, Israeli helicopters also used missiles to attack a Fatah office in Ramallah. Israel said it was retaliating for several Palestinian terror attacks, including a Sept. 6 shooting in which an Israeli soldier was killed.

Israel's Security Cabinet reacted to the continuing terror by approving a limited plan on Sunday to set up buffer zones between Israel and the West Bank to prevent infiltrations by Palestinian militants.

The Security Cabinet could decide, on a case-by-case basis, to make areas off-limits to Palestinians – except those who live there – and would permit troops to arrest non-residents.

Palestinian minister Yasser Abed Rabbo said the plan would make life intolerable for Palestinians living and working in the closed zones.

Despite the continued violence, European Union foreign ministers meeting in Brussels on Sunday issued a statement calling on Israel and the Palestinians to hold cease-fire talks.

The ministers said it was imperative for the EU and the United States to pressure the two sides to meet as soon as possible.

Before the latest eruption of violence, Arafat had been expected to call the EU foreign policy chief, Javier Solana, to announce the date and place of a meeting with Israeli Foreign Minister Shimon Peres.

EU officials had hoped for several weeks to arrange a Peres-Arafat meeting, but after the weekend violence it was not clear whether the two would meet any time soon.

Russia to sell another reactor to Iran

By ALUF BENN
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — On the day Prime Minister Ariel Sharon met Russian President Vladimir Putin in Moscow to request that the flow of nuclear knowledge and technology to Iran stop, Russia announced a new deal for the sale of nuclear reactors to Tehran.

According to the reports published last week, Russia is planning to sell nuclear reactors to Iran, which will be set up in the northwest Iranian city of Beshar. Negotiations for the contract for the construction of a second nuclear reactor in Beshar, estimated to cost $1 billion (US), will begin in December.

Russia sold a reactor to Iran several years ago, for an estimated $800 million. The reactor, which Iran maintains is for civilian purposes, is under the supervision of the International Atomic Energy Agency (IAEA), but Israeli military intelligence insists that its main use is for the development of a nuclear weapon.

Israeli assessments hold that an Iranian nuclear weapon will be deployed by 2005, while U.S. sources believe that this may not happen before 2007.

During their meeting, Putin promised Sharon that Israel would not be endangered and said that he would look into the Israeli claims.

For his part, Sharon agreed to initiate talks between Russian and Israeli experts; to this end, the head of the Israeli Atomic Energy Committee, Gideon Frank, accompanied the prime minister to Moscow. During talks held with their Russian counterparts, the Israeli team was not informed of any new nuclear technology deals with the Iranians.

Frank will depart next week at the head of an Israeli delegation to the annual meeting of the IAEA, and may meet with the Russian Minister for Atomic Energy, Aleksandr Romianichev, who only recently took office.

Israel is also sending a delegation of experts on arms control for talks with their counterparts in Moscow next week.

Students call for divestment from Israel

By JULIE WIENER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Equating Israel to apartheid South Africa, pro-Palestinian student activists hope to launch a campaign across the United States this fall urging universities to divest from companies that do business in the Jewish State.

Most Jewish leaders, who bristle at the comparison, are skeptical that such a movement would spur universities to change their financial holdings or even attract anywhere near the kind of support that was seen in the 1980s for the anti-apartheid movement.

However, the campaign comes just after non-governmental organizations at a UN conference in South Africa denounced Israel as a "racist" and "apartheid" state, and at a time when American Jewish students are not particularly well-educated about Israel or prepared to defend it.

Pro-Palestinian groups plan to kick off the campaign with a national conference Oct. 12 to 14 at the University of California at Berkeley, tentatively called Holding the University Accountable: Divesting From Israeli Apartheid.

Sponsored by Students for Justice in Palestine, a Berkeley organization, the conference's other supporters include the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee and SUSTAIN: Stop U.S. Taxpayer Assistance to Israel Now.

Organizers hope to attract up to 500 students from universities across the United States.

Michel Shehadeh, West Coast regional director of the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee, who will be a speaker at the Berkeley conference, said the divestment campaign's "ultimate goal" is to "end Israeli racism against the Palestinian people and democratize Israel so it would become a real democracy. It's a democracy for Jews only right now."

Israel, Shehadeh claimed, is "worse than apartheid."

The conference follows efforts last spring to convince the University of California to divest.

At a Berkeley protest in April that coincided with the celebration of Israel's Independence Day, pro-Palestinian students demanded that the university's Board of Regents divest $5.5 billion, which, it claimed, goes toward companies involved in Israel.

Regents at the university, which in 1985 divested from companies doing business in South Africa, haven't discussed divesting from Israel and have no plans to do so in the near future, according to a spokesperson.

Adam Weisberg, executive director of Berkeley's Hillel, was quoted this spring in the Jewish Bulletin of Northern California as saying that while any comparison between the Arab campaign and the one directed against apartheid South Africa is "completely fallacious," it is "a powerful analogy because the students aren't shown a lot of information."

"They hear 'apartheid,' which they know is a terrible thing, and think, well, Israel practises it, therefore I should support divestment," he said.

According to the Anti-Defamation League, the idea of divestment was also raised last year at the University of Michigan, but didn't gain any momentum.

Richard Joel, international president of Hillel: The Foundation for Jewish Campus Life, predicts that the divestment effort "will fall on its face. There are all kinds of complex issues in the Israel-Palestinian situation that people can disagree on," he said. "Divestiture is not one of them. To me, this whole divestment idea is as obscene as saying Zionism equals racism."

Combating such a campaign, Joel said, "is one that it's pretty easy to equip Jewish students to feel passionate about, because it's not about protecting the rights of Palestinians or moving to create a Palestinian state, [but a] direct assault on the legitimacy of a Jewish state."

Rhetorical links between Israel and apartheid South Africa are not new, but had been largely absent during the 1990s' peace process between Israel and the Palestinians.

In the mid-1980s, amid national efforts pressing for universities to divest from businesses involved in South Africa, several Arab groups and activists exaggerated the levels of trade and cooperation between Israel and South Africa, according to Yossi Abramowitz, author of Jews, Zionism and South Africa, a 1986 monograph published by Hillel.

At a Berkeley divestment rally in 1985, a Palestinian speaker denounced Zionism, and many people held posters featuring an Israeli flag and a South African flag, with the words "Stop Zionism and Racism."

In 1985, the University of California at Davis' anti-apartheid coalition required Jewish students who wanted to join to denounce Israel and Zionism and to support UN Resolution 3379 declaring Zionism to be a form of racism, according to Abramowitz's book.

Now CEO of Jewish Family and Life, a non-profit Jewish media company, Abramowitz said he is deeply concerned about the potential of a divestment campaign, as well as other anti-Israel campus activism.

Jewish students are not being given enough information or training, Abramowitz said, adding, "I don't think the Israeli government or the American Jewish community has figured out what the message is.

"We have the ability to pre-anticipate what the issues are going to be through the year, and you want to be able to hit hard and early and publicly to take a position of peace in the Middle East, an end to violence in the Middle East, and be prepared for these kinds of divestment and related tactics," he said.

"I'm just not overly confident that the students or the organizations that serve students are ready and able to do this."

Indeed, at the Israel Advocacy Day during an August conference for Jewish student leaders, many participants said they don't feel they have the knowledge or conviction to defend Israel on campus, and some even criticized the program for being too pro-Israel.

Editorials join in rare agreement

When was the last time the National Post, the Globe and Mail, and the Toronto Star agreed on anything? It takes a rare event to unite them all in a common cause, but the "gruesome comedy" (to use Aldous Huxley's phrase) surrounding the Durban Conference Against Racism was so overwhelming that editorial comment from all three papers flowed in the same direction – an absolute condemnation of the anti-Semitic witch-hunt against Israel at Durban.

The National Post was ahead of the curve with "Don't go to Durban, Mr. Manley" (Aug. 30), but the Globe was not far behind with "The hijacking of Durban" the next day. The Post's "Shambles in Durban" (Sept. 3), was followed by its "Durban intifada" (Sept. 6) which opened: "How did the United Nations World Conference Against Racism become an international week-long festival of anti-Semitism?"

The Globe's editorial of the same day, "Is it time to quit Durban?" was clear that Canada had no place in a forum hijacked by the Palestinians and Arab states insistent on an anti-Israel gang-up couched in singularly noxious "Zionism is racism" terms. As the Globe put it: "... to equate Zionism – 'the movement... to secure a national homeland for the Jewish people' – is to question the very existence of the Jewish State, and that is unacceptable. It is, in fact, itself a form of racism..."

Even the Star ("Challenge extremists at racism summit," Sept. 5), so often unfairly harsh towards Israel, wrote: "Most Canadians have been outraged by the hypocritical Israel-bashing and poisonous anti-Semitism that has shattered the credibility of the World Conference Against Racism."

Perhaps most surprising was the Star's avoidance in its firm moral stance by the intrusion of Israeli-Palestinian politics. The Star understood, as all the papers did, that the anti-Semitism/anti-Zionism of Durban needed to be denounced in absolute terms.

On Aug. 31, Charles Adler provided that absolute denunciation in his editorial on Global's national news, when he quoted the Rev. Martin Luther King, Jr.: "You declare, my friend, that you do not hate the Jews, you are merely 'anti-Zionist.' And I say... When people criticize Zionism, they mean Jews – this is God's own truth... Anti-Semitism, the hatred of the Jewish people, has been and remains a blot on the soul of mankind. In this we are in full agreement. So know also this: anti-Zionism is inherently anti-Semitic, and ever will be so."

According to Reports

Last week, many people heard the passionately eloquent Rex Murphy remind viewers of the CBC National News that "You don't have to be pro-Israel... to find [the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic rhetoric from Durban] alarming and disgusting."

Mike Hornbrook of CBC Radio on "World Report" (Sept. 3) surely had it right: "Some commentators [in Israel] believe Durban will ultimately generate sympathy for Israel. One writer says people are not stupid; they look at the leaders claiming to speak for freedom and democracy and they see Castro, Arafat and Mugabe. Only Saddam Hussein and Qaddafi are missing..."

And in words that have reportedly been cited in Durban, Nelson Mandela, the former president of South Africa, himself repeated the African National Congress's position first enunciated on Aug. 21, 1993, while he was the organization's leader: "We recognize," he reiterated, "the legitimacy of Zionism as Jewish nationalism."

While we should never overestimate people's intelligence, all these examples of media fairness should show us that we should not underestimate it either.

Prepared by Paul Michaels for the Canada-Israel Committee.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 3

• Prime Minister Ariel Sharon arrived in Moscow for a three-day visit with government officials.

• An 86-year-old woman mistakenly taken for dead regained full consciousness last week while her body was being purified for burial. The woman suddenly awoke during burial preparations. She was then taken to a Tel Aviv hospital.

Sept. 4

• An Israeli commission is slated to begin work in Buenos Aires on Jews who disappeared during Argentina's military regime between 1976 and 1983. The commission will also try to find information about Jewish children born in prison and then kidnapped.

Sept. 5

• Israel announced it would purchase 52 additional F-16 fighter planes from Lockheed Martin to add to its fleet.

• Ariel Sharon has called upon Russian Jewry to immigrate en-masse to Israel. Appearing before representatives of the Jewish community in Moscow, Sharon said Israel needs another million Jews in the coming years in order to guarantee its Jewish majority.

Sept. 6

• An Israeli was killed and another wounded in a drive-by shooting just inside the border with the PA-ruled territory near Tul Karm.

Sept. 7

• Sharon was reported to be furious over the army's plan to announce that parts of the area east of the Green Line between the West Bank and Israel would be a closed military zone. Sharon ordered the army to postpone the announcement and to cancel a press conference planned for it.

We want to help. So we're joining The International Coalition of Missing Israeli Soldiers by signing the petition on their site. The goal is to gather at least a million signatures to show the captors that the world cares. And the world wants those boys back where they belong. With their families in Israel.

Together we can make things happen! Please join us this Rosh Hashanah by sending a message of hope to those yearning families.

Iranian Jews renew amnesty appeal

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

TEHRAN — Family members of nine Iranian Jews convicted of spying for Israel a year ago renewed their appeal last week for a pardon, the news network Khabar reported.

At a meeting with reformist parliament speaker Mehdi Karrubi, family members again appealed for an amnesty from Iranian President Ayatollah Ali Khamenei. They also called for the temporary release of the detainees for the Jewish New Year later this month.

Karrubi said the detainees had the same rights as Muslims in Iran, adding that he hoped to settle the problems and clarify the fate of the detained Jews with the help of the judiciary.

A total of 13 Iranian Jews were arrested last year in Shiraz, the capital of the Fars province, on charges of spying for Israel. A court in Shiraz convicted 10, while the other three were acquitted. Nine of the Jews still remain in jail, after one of them was released earlier this year.

The case prompted widespread international protests, with Tehran categorically rebuking the criticism and dismissing foreign interference as "harming the judicial process in the case.

The sole Jewish lawmaker in the Iranian parliament, Maurice Motamed, who also attended the meeting with the speaker, is continuing his efforts through various channels to seek a pardon for the detainees.

Some 35,000 Jews live in Iran, including 6,000 in Shiraz.

Durban will not lead to a Palestinian state

By YOEL MARCUS
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

Analysis

Israelis went a bit overboard last week in their reaction to the World Conference against Racism in Durban.

One of my colleagues described the anti-Israel and anti-Semitic atmosphere of the Durban conference as another Kristallnacht; another issued the cry, "Hitler is at the gate."

Former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu bewailed the failure of Israel's public relations efforts, as if anti-Semitism and racist hatred, two plagues of which the Jews have been the chief victims in every generation, could be uprooted with one brilliant speech before the television camera.

Israel's politicians looked on helplessly as Israel became a doormat to be stepped on at the international gathering convened for the lofty purpose of combating racism. The fact that the conference was taken over by the Arabs, led by Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat, who is supposed to be Israel's partner in a peace dialogue, has been described as an alarming public relations development.

Phrases like "a return to the incitement of the Nuremberg era" strike me as rather silly. The scenes of Africans demonstrating in Durban against racism alongside Arabs was grotesque rather than alarming. For centuries, Arab slave traders kidnapped Africans during tribal wars and sold them to whites for transportation to America.

It has been reported that many Africans do not even know where Israel is, have never heard of the Holocaust, and have not the slightest knowledge of the fact that throughout history, Jews have been favourite victims of racists.

Sometimes the pretext for anti-Semitic persecution has been the accusation that the Jews killed Christ; sometimes the pretext has been that wherever Jews lived, they maintained their own unique identity yet knew how to manage and even prosper. Nineteenth-century British prime minister Benjamin Disraeli once retorted to his colleagues in parliament that when their ancestors were still climbing trees, his ancestors were writing the Bible.

In light of all the pogroms, the Holocaust that destroyed a third of the Jewish nation, the Arabic cry "Itbach al-Yahud!" (slaughter the Jews), which has been heard from the first day that Jews set foot on the soil of the Holy Land and can still be heard today – in light of all this – Israel certainly can give the keynote address on the nature of racism and on how it feels to be its victim.

We should focus on who voted for anti-Israel resolutions

The Arabs, under Arafat's orchestration, abducted the entire conference and its vital human topics and turned the gathering into a weapon to be used against Israel. With a billion Muslims in the world today, this is definitely not a pleasant situation.

However, the causes of human rights and anti-racism are not justly served when a large portion of the Muslim world still metes out justice by cutting off hands and decapitating people, when most Muslims live in countries that are run by dictators and – in the name of religion or simply in the name of brute power for power's sake – are arming themselves with weapons of mass destruction while the majority of their citizens live in poverty without even the smallest vestige of any human rights.

One should ignore the demonstrations and resolutions that were passed outside the conference of government representatives. Instead, one should focus on such issues as who voted for and against the resolutions intended to turn Israel into a pariah.

Since the United States, Canada, most of the countries of Europe, Australia and a large number of Asian states, including India, were not prepared to participate in the campaign to condemn Israel as a racist state, the Durban conference can be considered a pyrrhic victory as far as Arafat is concerned.

The participation of African nations in this anti-Israeli campaign has a distressing background. The former colonies that became independent states around the same time as Israel achieved its independence have, for the most part, failed in the area of statecraft. The majority of these countries are dictatorships, ravaged by hunger and plagued by tribal wars or conflicts with their neighbours.

The Palestinians are the most talented and diligent nation in the Arab world and could have had their own independent and flourishing state alongside Israel long ago if they had accepted the Nov. 29, 1947 United Nations resolution that called for the partitioning of British Mandatory Palestine into two states – one Jewish, one Arab.

Most Israelis want an end to the conflict. It could have ended under the late Yitzhak Rabin, or under Shimon Peres or Ehud Barak. The Oslo agreement paved the way for Arafat toward an independent Palestinian state; however, the person who shared the Nobel peace prize with Rabin and Peres is not willing to part company with his role as the flying propagandist or the head of a guerrilla movement.

As the chief inciter of anti-Israel and anti-Semitic hatred among his people, Arafat may have done a great hatchet job on Israel in Durban, but this kind of activity will never get him his own independent state.

Israel welcomes Durban declaration

By NITZAN HOROWITZ and YAIR SHELEG
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Israel welcomed, on Sunday, the final declaration adopted by the United Nations' World Conference Against Racism. Sources in the Foreign Ministry praised the final declaration and called it a major success for Israel.

The sources said that Israel had managed to achieve a complete turnaround; they said the declaration was "one of the greatest achievements ever at an international organization."

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Ha'aretz that the final declaration was a "stinging defeat for the Arab League."

Israel and the United States walked out of the conference in South Africa last week in protest at Arab and Islamic demands to single out Israel for criticism that pushed to the sidelines other issues on the agenda of the largest ever conference on racism and xenophobia.

After hours of wrangling, the conference finally adopted the full compromise formula put forward by South African Foreign Minister Nkosazana Dlimini-Zuma.

Syria, supported by Pakistan, tabled a last-minute motion calling for the conference, which had already been extended by a day, to adopt a text implicitly referring to Israel as racist. But the motion was rejected in a conference vote, clearing the way for adoption of the Durban Declaration that lays down a program of action to combat racism and xenophobia.

On the Middle East, the conference called for "the end of violence and the swift resumption of peace negotiations; respect for international human rights and humanitarian law; and respect for the principle of self-determination and the end of all suffering," thus allowing Israel and the Palestinians to resume the peace process, and to develop and prosper in security and freedom.

"Expressing concern about the plight of the Palestinian people under foreign occupation," the conference, in its declaration, recognized the inalienable right of the Palestinian people to self-determination and to the establishment of an independent state. It also recognized the "right to security for all states in the region, including Israel, and called upon all states to support the peace process and bring it to an early conclusion."

An official Foreign Ministry statement said that "Israel is satisfied that the clauses full of hate and incitement against it and the Jewish nation were removed from the conference's final document."

"The language that was approved in Durban in our absence...is not the best and we opposed it, but it is completely different from the venomous decisions the extremist countries wanted passed. The non-democratic countries failed in their attempt to determine laws for the enlightened world on human rights issues that would have turned the conference into a theatre of the absurd," the statement added.

Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Ha'aretz that a number of non-democratic states with a numerical majority had tried to teach the democratic states democracy and human rights. But, he said, the automatic majority of the Arab League collapsed. The democratic world made it clear that the resolutions bordered on the absurd and that it would not give in to the dictates of the non-democratic world.

"The key to the success of the conference was the help of the United States, which showed everyone the way. After the United States said stop, it came to a stop," said Peres.

The fact that the United States, Europe, Australia, Canada and India all stood on the side of justice tipped the scales. We have not seen such a strong front for a long time, after having been used to the support only of Micronesia. Thanks to correct diplomacy by Israel, with the aim for peace at its centre and stubborn adherence to basic principals, the automatic majority against Israel was broken, he said.

Peres also told Ha'aretz that he attached great importance to the fact that the final declaration was sponsored by the South African President Thabo Mbeki, whom he described as the most prominent leader in Africa.

"There is not one word condemning Israel in the entire document," Deputy Foreign Minister Michael Melchior told Israel Channel Two television.

"They [the Arab countries] didn't succeed and not only didn't they succeed, it was the first time the whole world stood behind us," he added.

"But I think it should concern us that there is so much hate against us in the Arab world."

The other main issue to dominate the conference was slavery. Arguments over the slavery issue were a major point of contention, with African states pressing for an explicit apology from Western governments. A deal on slavery was only sealed in the early hours of yesterday, with Africa settling for something less – expressions of regret and the promise of more aid for development projects.

Cantor to sing in new R. Murray Shafer opera

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Internationally known, Toronto-based, opera singer Joel Katz is in demand this fall.

Katz is dividing his time between performances as The Blue Man in R. Murray Schafer's world premiere of The Palace of the Cinnabar Phoenix, serving on the faculty of the Royal Conservatory of Music and singing at Temple Sinai's High Holy Day services, where last year he co-shared cantor duties.

The Palace of the Cinnabar Phoenix is the eighth part in Canadian composer Schafer's 10-part Patria cycle, which Katz says is both tuneful and comic. The operatic theatre spectacular directed by choreographer Robert Desrosiers will be presented at 7:30 p.m., at a pond at Wolverton Hills, 196 Waite Rd. in Pontypool, 90 minutes north-east of Toronto, from Sept. 13 to 16.

The theatrical is set in China during the Tang Dynasty, (618-907). Emperor Wei Lu bemoans the disappearance of the Cinnabar Phoenix, which has led to the loss of peace and harmony. Schafer unites Chinese and western musicians, a girls' choir, tai chi performers, opera singers lending their voices to puppets and Katz as The Blue Man.

"I am the only human that appears with the puppets," says Katz. "I am a great fan of Murray. He's written some brilliant pieces that are whimsical and profound at times. I think he is one of Canada's great composers," says Katz.

"One of the things Murray is interested in is doing pieces in the natural landscape. I begin singing a chant that refers to the moon and the water, using a First Nations dialect. I'm on a raft rowed by six oarsmen across the pond to the stage. My character is an agent, whereby the magical rings representing yin and yang are reunited," Katz says.

"The fairy tale from the Tang Dynasty is about transformation and reawakening of original bliss. The metaphor for that is the palace of Cinnabar Phoenix. When yin and yang reunite, the mythical palace that symbolizes lost perfection will re-emerge."

Katz is a graduate of the University of Toronto's opera school. His first professional engagement was with the Canadian Opera Company in the '70s, moving from the chorus to small parts. After a year working for the Opera Theater of St. Louis, Katz moved to Germany, where he won the Munich International Competition in 1982. As an oratorio soloist, he has performed with many national and international orchestras, including the Toronto, Edmonton and St. Louis symphonies, the Bavarian Radio Orchestra and the Ludwigsburger Festival Orchestra.

"I love singing with orchestra," he says. "In 1999, I went to Taiwan and sang the new song cycle with the Taipei Philharmonic, written for me by the composer, Ted Dawson. I was on the same program as pianist Christina Petrowska, who was married to my former teacher, Louis Quilico, who was at the concert. When she was playing, I had an intense feeling that I was exactly where I wanted to be. It felt like a perfect moment. Then I went out and sang my song and I really had just a sense of being at the right place at the right time."

The singer, who frequently appears on Bravo! Television is booked well into 2002. On Feb. 3, Katz will be singing in Nabucco for Opera in Concert at Toronto's Jane Mallett Theatre. On Feb. 10, he'll perform Hunding in the first act of Die Walkure for Toronto's Song Circle at the Arts and Letters Club. On April 14, at the Royal Conservatory, in concert with long-time accompanist Brahm Goldhamer, Katz will record a recital of Franz Schubert rarities for a future CD.

Katz is planning a concert about the music of Richard Wagner featuring composers influenced by this controversial classical music figure and those who disliked him but referred to him in their music.

"There won't be much Wagner on the program. He'll be conspicuous by his absence. I'm going to present works on the theme of Wagner. I'm going to leave it to the intelligence of the audience to figure out where the connections are. I'm a firm believer in not underestimating your public," says Katz.

When not on stage, the avid gardener teaches at the Royal Conservatory. "I feel I'm drawn to teaching because it is in my heritage, I come from a long line of professors and rabbis, so it comes very naturally to me. The further you get along in your career, [the more] you feel you want to pass something on, apropos of your struggles and what you've learned. I also feel I have to perform, that it's a part of what I am and if I'm not performing, I just don't feel balanced."

New Waterford Girl is Hollywood bound

By DAVE GORDON
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — When you've got a unique story to tell, you might eventually get tired of talking about it, especially if every newspaper reporter has asked about it already.

"If you've read the press kit, you know the story," local actress Liane Balaban, 21, says of her rise to stardom.

"I'm actually thinking of making up a story next time someone asks, I'm so sick of it," she says, half-jokingly.

In the meantime, despite sounding legendary and apocryphal, this is the Hollywood-bound actress's true Hollywood-style "discovery": her big break came two years ago, with the Canadian-made film New Waterford Girl. The film's producer lives on her uncle's street, and has known Balaban since she was very young. On a whim, she asked her to audition. Seven auditions later, though Balaban had never acted on film before, she got the lead.

Fresh out of high school, Balaban was perfect for the role of Mooney Pottie, a precocious and quirky Nova Scotian teen feeling suffocated by a small-town's lack of opportunity.

"I wish I was popular, and cool, and wished I had worried less about being normal in high school," says Balaban about her own high school experience.

"But by 16 I was too bitter to care," she laughs.

For her role in New Waterford Girl, the novice actress won the Special Jury Prize for Best Canadian Film at the Toronto International Film Festival two years ago. A year later, she was again in the lead role, with her second film, St. Jude, a dark and surreal urban tale based in Montreal.

But now, Hollywood beckons. Her new film, World Traveler, with Julianne Moore (Boogie Nights, Hannibal) and Billy Crudup (Almost Famous), opened at this month's Toronto International Film Festival.

Balaban was only roughly familiar with co-star Moore's movie work when shooting began.

"I didn't want to see any of her movies," she says. "I didn't want to be awestruck by her celebrity-dom."

When Balaban sees movies, they are likely obscure French films. There are successful French directors, according to Balaban, who shoot all in one take – and she believes similarly that over-thinking could hamper her budding acting style.

"I'm acquiring tools for my [acting] toolbox," she says. "I draw from life experiences. Sometimes when you have a whole system of training you become a self-conscious actor."

Balaban seems to be doing just fine without it. As recently as last month, acclaimed director Francis Ford Coppola asked her to go to New York to read through his new script.

But the perceived allure of big-shot directors and American movies isn't always glamorous.

"It's insane and hectic," she says of her film schedule. "It can get mundane and monotonous. You really only spend about 10 percent of the time actually filming, with the camera rolling."

Balaban contemplates how her film work coincides with leaving the high school years, and the high school roles, behind.

"I used to find solace in knowing that after a certain age, all of my self-doubt and neuroses would vanish, and I'd be a self-assured adult," she says. "I'd know who I was and I'd have my place in life, and I'd be confident and self-assured. I was thinking maybe at age 23. Through my film work, I've discovered that neuroses don't vanish when you're an adult. [They] actually become more acute."

After World Traveler, Balaban will star in Happy Here and Now along with David Arquette (Scream), Ally Sheedy (Breakfast Club), Gloria Reuben (E.R.) and supermodel Shalom Harlow.

She has co-written a short film with collaborator Jonas Bell-Pasht, called The Annual Crafts and Arts Contest, which they hope to premiere at a film festival in the near future.

As for what's next, Balaban isn't sure.

"I promise to be strange and creative within the next five years," she says reflectively. Then she smiles. "I dunno – I'd really like to kill someone on screen and participate in a bloodbath!"

One of a kind pottery in Niagara

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

NIAGARA ON THE LAKE — Some three million visitors come to Niagara on the Lake each season and many of those who love pottery make their way to Susan Wintrop's studio, East West Pottery.

"Some acquire a new piece each year as a token of their visit," says Wintrop who has worked as a raku potter for more than 16 years. Many of her pieces of raku are in the Japanese tradition.

The raku technique dates back several hundred years to Japan and refers to the glazing process then used exclusively in making tea ceremony implements, she explains.

"The pottery's dramatic plunge into a fire pit and its subsequent markings of chance were considered sacred and pots were given names if they were just right."

Each piece is one of a kind because of this process and bears the marks of the series of traumas it undergoes and survives, she says.

"It's all really an allegory of ourselves and thus the Zen connection."

Wintrop, who first became interested in Asian art at the age of 14, attended Forest Hill Collegiate and then George Brown College where she studied ceramic art. She went on to graduate with a fine arts degree from the Ontario College of Art.

She has taught at Hart House and the Royal Ontario Museum and is now at Pumphouse Visual Arts Centre.

Wintrop has also worked at the YMCA as associate director of adult education for community and continuing education and she designs awards for industry, universities and corporations.

In addition, Wintrop produces graphic art and advertising, specializing in calligraphy. She has been featured in numerous publications and has exhibited at The George M. Gardiner Museum of Ceramic Art, The Japanese Canadian Cultural Centre and Hart House Gallery at the University of Toronto.

Wintrop was recently featured in the Artistry by the Lake at Niagara on the Lake and will exhibit at the Shaw Show of the Arts in Niagara in August and the One of a Kind Craft Show in Toronto in December.

Her works can also be found in Canadian, American and European galleries as well as corporate and museum collections.

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

NEW PUBLICATIONS REACH OUT TO JEWISH YOUNG

Perhaps you've heard of Heeb Magazine: The New Jew Review.

The new mag with the deliberately sassy name is meant as a national quarterly of arts, culture and progressive politics for Jews in their 20s and 30s. It was started by a collective of eight young Americans with access to foundation money.

The radical-chic publication defines itself as "the bastard child of Emma Goldman and Lenny Bruce" and is targeted towards a disaffected younger generation that remains aloof from traditional communal structures.

Only in America, you say?

Well, not entirely. A separate magazine for Jewish youth is getting under way in Canada, too, although it won't be nearly as brazen as its American counterpart.

Perhaps you've seen Afterword, the national paper that has already been serving Jewish students across Canada for several years. This month, the little paper is preparing a whole new look, geared to a wider audience defined as "the young Jewish scene" with articles aimed at 18- to 30-year-olds. The fall issue is due Sept. 14.

The revamped paper will boast some new columnists and be supported by a new Web site whose address has yet to be announced. According to advance publicity, the issue will feature interviews with CNN host Larry King, former Israeli prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu, Maccabiah karate medalist Brad Cohen and the Hip Hop Jews (evidently a musical band).

New columnists include Josh Cogan of Toronto-based Mojo Radio (formerly Talk 640), senior political analyst Mark Eltis of Waterloo University, and special guest columnist author Rabbi Shmuley (Kosher Sex) Boteach of England.

Afterword should be available soon from Hillel outlets and select kosher restaurants and synagogues. For pick up locations, please e-mail Afterwordmag@hotmail.com.

An Evening of Yiddish Song: Prof. Anna Shternshis, a new instructor in the Yiddish studies program at the University of Toronto, presents an evening devoted to Yiddish music and folklore in conjunction with the university's department of Germanic languages and literature.

Participants will "learn to sing some of the most beloved Yiddish songs and find out the fascinating stories behind them," a press release advises. They'll also learn about the department's three Yiddish courses that are starting soon.

"No musical or Yiddish knowledge is necessary – just buoyant spirits and a healthy appetite" are required, since desserts, tea and coffee will be provided.

Thursday, Sept. 13, 6:30 to 9 p.m. German department common room, 3rd floor, Odette Hall, St. Michael's College, 50 St. Joseph St. (at Bay). 416-926-2319. Web site, www.chass.utoronto.ca/german/.

Yiddishland Cafe: Workmen's Circle presents Stories and Songs from Yesteryear: Stories by Isaac Bashevis Singer and Songs from Our Treasure. Performers are Nathan Garnick (readings in English and Yiddish), David Wall (songs) and Sarah Luminsky (accordion).

Tickets are $12, available at Workmen's Circle and Israel's Judaica. Workmen's Circle, 471 Lawrence Ave. W. Sunday, Sept. 23, 7:30 p.m.

Chanteuse to film Edith Piaf tribute concert at Elgin Theatre

By KATHRYN KATES
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Moroccan born singer Raquel Bitton took a gamble and it paid off big!

Bitton left the comforts of San Francisco cabarets, where she and her husband/manager Gerald Prolman reside and booked her show Raquel Bitton Sings Edith Piaf, Her Story...Her Songs, a tribute to the French songbird, into the grandest concert halls of North America starting with New York's Carnegie Hall.

In under two years, Bitton has become an annual staple at the famous hall, where she next appears with The New York Pops on March 22, 2002.

In response to the reaction worldwide to her show based on the life and songs of Edith Piaf, Bitton wanted to commit this work to the big screen. She chose Toronto's Elgin Theatre to film the concert footage for this documentary feature slated to premiere at the Sundance Film Festival.

Piaf is considered one of the foremost performers of French music from the 1930s and '40s. Bitton is universally recognized for interpretations of the Piaf songbook. Her concerts and the upcoming film both consist of songs sung in French with stories told in English.

"It is my script, my concept, my scenario, my research – I created this whole monster," she stated with a chuckle. "There is a co-relation between Piaf and I. I insist upon people knowing before I sing, that there will never be another Edith Piaf, but out of her ashes will come out new voices that will deeply inspire. I treasure my life; I don't have to live in the shadow of anyone. We share a sameness of emotion in common and in researching her.

"The reason I dove into this repertoire and embraced the songs, written over 50 years ago, is because of the stories in the songs - they echo in my heart. When people watch me sing the songs she sang first, they don't see her, they see me. I jazz up and modernize the arrangements. I didn't have her life, I wasn't of her generation and I didn't have her lovers - thank God, since she had bad taste in them. What I have is that extreme love for life and for pain, but I have my own journey," adds Bitton.

The chanteuse is no stranger to Canadian stages, last year she performed sold out shows at Toronto's Massey Hall and for the first time a French version at Montreal's Place des Art - a hit especially with Montreal's large Moroccan population.

"I had a choice to go anywhere around the world to do this film, I chose Toronto. Not only because it is a known fact that filmmakers flock to Toronto, but also it was the experience I had with the musicians when I performed at Massey Hall. It was so special to me that I thought it would be fantastic to do the film in Toronto. We wanted a beautiful art deco theatre and felt that the Elgin Theatre is amazing," says Bitton.

After the concert footage is shot in Toronto, the production team makes its way to Paris for the anniversary of Piaf's death. Piaf died penniless on October 11, 1963. "I am going to retrace the Piaf phenomenon – her life from poverty to stardom. We will film a lunch at a restaurant at the foot of Pere la Chaise, the cemetery where she's buried. Joining me will be prominent musicians and stars that had known her. We will eat, drink wine and tell stories, then I will sing at her mass," says Bitton.

The production concludes in Morocco, the birthplace of both Bitton and Piaf's grandparents. Concurrently Bitton is working on her fifth and sixth CD for Higher Octane/Virgin Records. The mother of two, Julian 13 and Natalie Sabrine 11, has enlisted her daughter to act in the film as her younger self, depicting Bitton growing up in Morocco and dreaming about being a singer one day.

Her concert at the Elgin Theatre will be filmed on Sept. 21 at 8 p.m.

Actor likes challenge of one-woman plays

By BEN ROSE
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Actor and director Carol Lempert doesn't agree that there are too many plays about the Holocaust.

"I was drawn to No Posthumous Victory by the impact the Holocaust has had on the second generation of survivors, an impact that the world doesn't know about," said Lempert, who directed the play, which showed at the recent SummerWorks festival.

The Holocaust had an impact on the play's writer and sole performer, Anne Ptasznik.

"The play is about how her father went through the experience, but it's also about a whole generation of people and how the Holocaust impacts their children and even their children's children," said Lempert. "Anne is so candid; she doesn't dance around the Holocaust. She tells it like it is."

Although Ptasznik's play takes place in Canada, it has flashbacks to Auschwitz and Israel.

She wrote it after training as an interviewer for Steven Spielberg's project, The Shoah, and after interviewing her father, who, for the first time, told her of the unspoken pain he carries as a survivor.

Lempert has had her own Holocaust experience: her uncle lost his family in the tragedy.

She has played the elder sister in The Diary of Anne Frank as well as the sister who grows up in Poland before coming to Canada in Shayna Maidel, directed by the late Al Waxman.

A native of Detroit, Lempert came to Canada in 1986, obtaining a master's degree in theatre from York University. She is married to actor Scott Watson.

She has appeared in Crossing Delancey and Beau Geste at Leah Posluns Theatre, and is fast developing a reputation as a director of one-woman plays. No Posthumous Victory is her fourth such show.

"The word is out," she said, "and women hear about it and they give me a buzz. I met Ptasznik at a party about a year ago, and after we talked for a while, she asked me if I would direct her play.

"Directing a one-woman play is a unique challenge. When you are directing a piece with more than one actor, you are making sure the actors connect with each other. In a situation with a one-person show, you have to make sure the performer connects with the audience."

Lempert is also known for her work writing, producing and performing in the one-woman show, That Dorothy Parker, at the Fringe Festival, which won several awards, including best play, at the San Francisco Fringe.

"A one-woman show is a bit of a vanity piece, but I wasn't so vain to do the whole thing without a director. The director brings a very objective eye to the work."

Remnants of a Jewish heritage in Provence

The synagogue at Cavaillon in the south of France. Probably a remnant from the year of construction, which occurred in the Hebraic year 5534. [Wolf Arnold photo]

By WOLF ARNOLD
Special to The CJN

PROVENCE — Jewish life, once vibrant, hardly seems to exist here anymore. Jewish cemeteries, often neglected, and former ghettos can still be found. Synagogues that have survived still stand intact in centres such as Marseille, Carpentras, Avignon and Cavaillon.

The area around Avignon, known as the Comtat Venaissin, was given to the Holy See by King Philip the Rash in 1247. Decades later, the popes forced from Rome, acquired the town of Avignon in 1348, and under the papal government, Jewish communities flourished.

The popes' decisions were guided by the belief of St. Bernard de Clairvaux, a 12th century mystic, who said that "He who touches a Jew is as guilty as if he had set to the eyes of Jesus himself, for the Jews are his flesh and bones."

When the South joined the Kingdom of France where Judaism was not tolerated, the papal state welcomed Jews who were expelled elsewhere. Although enjoying liberties such as the freedom of religion and residence, Jewish people were forced to live in separate quarters, usually in the centre of town, which were closed off by a chain at nightfall and during Christian holidays.

In 1215, the IV Lateran Council obliged the town of Avignon to enforce a ruling that Jews had to wear a rouelle, which in the 16th century was replaced by a yellow hat, while women had to wear a small yellow rosette sewn into their headgear.

During the Renaissance, Christian guilds succeeded in forcing Jews from such occupations as apothecary, medicine, bookbinding, masonry, stonecutting and baking. By the end of the 17th century, these occupations had all but disappeared from the Jewish communities.

The population dwindled too. In one case, a mere 200 Jews remained within the ghetto walls of Cavaillon in 1787, a town which had once housed 6,000.

Typically, a Jewish quarter, known as the carriere, which derived from the Provençal word for street, was located in the centre of town.

At Cavaillon, the Jewish quarter existed since the early 17th century. With the rue Hebraïque as its main street, the heart of this small ghetto is the synagogue. Built over a vaulted passageway, the synagogue is one of the few in Provence that still remains as it appeared centuries ago.

Overlooking the short rue Hebraïque, the building has a decorated facade with fine grillwork painted in green. When one passes under the archway, there appears to the left a turret-like structure, believed to be a remnant of the original synagogue that was erected in the 15th century.

At the entrance to the synagogue, shaded by the vaulted passage, an inscription reads "This is the gate of the Lord into which the righteous shall enter," and the Hebraic year of construction: 5534. The present synagogue was built in 1774 and houses on its lower floor the Comtat Jewish Museum, which contains the old bakehouse ovens, manuscripts, prayer books and objects of Jewish liturgy.

At L'Isle-sur-la-Sorgue, a sleepy Provençal town, all that remains of the Jewish ghetto is the place de la Juiverie, its name appearing on a simple street sign.

In nearby Carpentras the synagogue survived and stands in the centre of town. It was built in the middle of the 18th century by a French architect. Due to strict local regulations it had to be bare of any exterior decorations and its facade had to blend in with neighbouring buildings. The bakery and the mikvah are in the lower part of the structure that dates back to the Middle Ages. A grand staircase leads up to the worship halls.

If you go:

The Comtadin Jewish Museum at the Cavaillon synagogue is open from 10 a.m. to 12 noon, and from 2 p.m. to 6 p.m. during the summer. It is closed on Tuesday. Their telephone number is 90 76 00 34. The local tourist office is helpful with brochures and information on the town's history. During the summer months it conducts walking tours of Cavaillon. Its address is Office de Tourisme, 79, Rue Saunerie, 84300 Cavaillon, France. Tel.: 90 71 32 01. For a detailed brochure on the town and its synagogue, write to: Musées et Patrimoine de Cavaillon, 52, Place Castil-Blaze, 84300 Cavaillon, France.

Cavaillon is a typical Provençal town. Famous for its melons, it is located on the banks of the Durance at the foot of the Luberon mountains. A Gallo-Roman arch still survives. The town is located 20 kilometres south-east of Avignon and 60 kilometres from the Mediterranean. Cavaillon can be reached via the Autoroute A7.

At Carpentras, the hours for visiting the synagogue are from 10 a.m. to 12 noon and from 3 p.m. to 5 p.m. Closed on Saturdays and Sundays. The phone number is 90 63 39 97. The tourist office is at 170, allée Jean Jaurès. Telephone 90 63 57 88. Carpentras was the former capital of the Comtat Venaissin (the county of Avignon).

In L'Isle-sur-la Sorgue, a town criss-crossed by arms of the Sorgue river which still drives some old mill wheels, the tourist office is in the place de l'Eglise. Their phone number is 90 38 04 78.

Baycrest delivers fitness training to seniors at home

TORONTO — There's a knock at the door and Selma Sage is expecting a special visitor. For the past year, the Harvard-educated scholar and grandmother of eight has been working with a personal fitness professional who comes to her home every Wednesday from the Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care.

"I've been a professor and scholar all my life," says Sage. "I paid attention to my intellect, but neglected my body. I've paid a price for that, but now I'm doing something about it."

Sage was one of the first seniors to join Baycrest's new PEP for Seniors (Personal Exercise Program), launched last year. It's a unique outreach program in which fitness professionals who have experience working with older adults provide personalized exercise in the home.

Suffering from severe arthritis in her knees, shoulders and hips, Sage found her mobility and overall health deteriorating. Even simple tasks, such as getting out of a chair or going for a leisurely walk with her husband Sam Siegelman, proved difficult. Although she participates in the swim exercise program at the Wagman Centre, she knew she needed additional exercise to get into better shape.

That's when her Wagman Centre aquatics instructor suggested she try PEP for Seniors. In the year Sage has been with the program, her physical fitness has improved dramatically.

"My knees used to be horrible. Now I've strengthened the muscles which support my knees so they don't hurt as much," she says. "I feel a lot stronger in my thighs and hips and more stable on my feet."

Dianne Cullen, her personal trainer from Baycrest's PEP program, arrives with a bag full exercise equipment. For the next hour, she puts Sage through a personally designed exercise routine.

"To be able to exercise in such a personalized way in the privacy of my own home is wonderful," she says. "People have noticed a change in me, and my clothes fit differently too. I have muscles now that I never had before."

On the days Cullen is not around to coach her, Sage is cycling 20 to 25 minutes a day and exercising twice a week at the Wagman Centre pool.

PEP for Seniors is supported by the Barrie-to-Baycrest riders.

For more information, call Baycrest at 416-785-2500, ext. 2752.

Non-maternal care not bad for children's early years: research

JERUSALEM — Good news for the working mother: Researchers at the Hebrew University here have found that non-maternal care in children's early years does not adversely influence their development.

The researchers' conclusions were published recently in the magazine Psychological Bulletin.

Dr. Osnat Erel, Dr. Nurit Yirmiya and Ms. Yael Oberman of the Hebrew University School of Education conducted a statistical summary of 59 experimental studies that examined the link between maternal versus non-maternal care. They also studied seven developmental outcomes, including those related to the quality of the connection between mother and child, adjustment difficulties, social skills, and cognitive development. Nearly all of the studies examined were conducted in the United States.

Also examined were whether certain variables, such as the age at which the child begins the non-maternal care, the gender of the child, the number of hours the child spends in non-maternal care, and how the social standing of the family influences the connection between the type of care and the child's development.

"Women tend to believe they're harming their children's development by going out to work, but there is no scientific proof for that," said Erel.

She explained that the analyses indicate there's no support for the belief that a child's development is either positively or negatively associated with type of care.

Erel said, however, that "one must be cautious in reaching an absolute conclusion that the type of care has no influence on the child's development because there are still many variables involved on which research has not yet been conducted, including the measuring of the quality of the non-maternal care and the special needs of various children."

Also, she said, the links between type of care and child development have not been studied, "and therefore we still don't have an answer to complex questions, such as whether high-quality, non-maternal care influences children from different social strata in different ways. This is a question which takes into consideration the type of care provided, its quality, and also the social standing of the family."

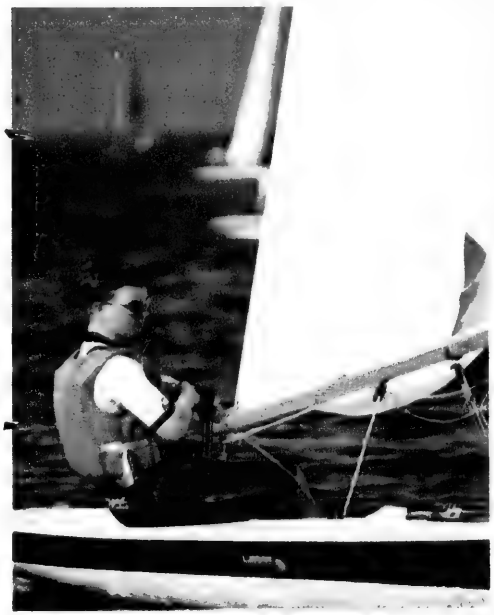
Singer sailor wins gold at Canada Games

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Press him on the issue, and Alex Singer is happy to tell you a little bit about his Byte.

It's not the computer-generated data fragment that gets him excited, but rather, a sailboat that resembles a Laser, but with a smaller hull and sail.

It's made for young or light people and Singer, 18 and only 130 pounds, is an expert when it comes to making his Byte go fast. He's pretty well the fastest Canadian in the Byte and one of the fastest in the world.



Singer in action.

Singer recently raced his boat to a first-place finish at the Canada Summer Games in Grand Bend, Ont., with a combined 10 points in eight races (the lower the score, the better). In nine races during the week of sailing, Singer finished first seven times and second three times.

Singer, who doesn't like to toot his own horn, attributed his success to hard work and good coaching.

"I've just been training a lot," he said. "I was training in Miami during the winter and I improved a lot there."

All his hard work has certainly paid off, with Singer recording something of a dream season in 2001. A member of the Canadian National Youth Squad, Singer finished second in the Byte World Championships in Mantoloking, N.J., first in the Sail East regatta in North Sydney, N.S., first in the Three Macs regatta in Hudson, Que., fifth in the Canadian National Youth Championships in Charlottetown, P.E.I., and second in the Ice-breaker regatta in Toronto.

Singer's silver at the Byte World Championships may have been an even greater achievement than the win in Canada. Unlike the Canada Games, in which only nine boats – the best from nine provinces – competed, the world championships featured 71 contestants from around the world. Singer eclipsed all other male sailors, ultimately losing to a Finnish girl, who won the gold.

"It was pretty exciting," he recalled, "but probably the Canada Games were more exciting."

The opening ceremonies, the media throngs and the cheering crowds gave the Canadian competition a big league atmosphere, he said.

Although he's still a young guy, Singer has been sailing for quite some time. In fact, he comes from a sailing – and pretty active – family.

Go back far enough on the family tree and you'll find that his grandfather, Percy Singer, was a good all-round athlete and quarterback for the University of Toronto. His other granddad, Martin Levene, taught sailing at Camp Arowhon. His dad, Steve, is a fine golfer, and his mom, Myrna, sailed at Arowhon. His older brother Eric was head of sailing at Arowhon for several years. What's more, the family keeps a sailboat at their summer cottage, so getting access to a boat is never a problem.

As a youngster, Singer tooled around on a boat at Camp Wahanowin, and at 13, he took lessons at a day camp at the Conestoga Sailing Club in his native Waterloo. He progressed to the point where he was teaching younger kids the fundamentals of sailing.

Two years ago he was introduced to Bytes and a little later he hooked up with Ryan Mahaffey, whom Singer calls "the best sailor" at the Conestoga club.

Mahaffey, who has coached the Ontario team at the world championships, had himself been to a world competition, Singer said. He taught Singer techniques, tactics and ways to get and maintain a mental edge over competitors.

Analyzing his own abilities, Singer says his strength is in coaxing the most speed out of the boat on the downwind leg of a race.

"It depends on how you move the boat through the waves," he said. "You manoeuvre it to surf the waves, ride the crests, not the troughs. So, it's a lot of technique and feel."

Sailing in a landlocked area like Waterloo, you're not likely to get much wind or chop. To give himself the open seas experience, Singer trained in Miami, and earlier this summer, he spent a month at a private camp in Kingston, where conditions are a little rougher than Waterloo.

In Miami, he sailed a Laser, a bigger boat than a Byte and one that proved challenging. At 130 pounds, he's the perfect size for a Byte, but his lack of weight meant he had to work harder in the Laser, shifting his weight to the high side of the boat when the wind was pushing the sail in the other direction. It's all part of a technique of keeping the hull flat in the water, to get as much speed as possible out of the boat, he said.

Next season, Singer will move up to an Olympic-class boat, the 470. It's a two-man boat so he's sniffing around for a partner, technically, a "crew," while he'll man the tiller and mainsail and act as "skipper."

As for the years to follow, he's planning to attend university rather than devote himself full time to sailing. But, there's a caveat. The school had better have a good sailing program, he said.

Singer claims his first-place finish reward.

The Durban debacle

The motliest crew of Jew-haters, tin-pot despots and racists the world can cough up came together in Durban last week to denounce a healthy, thriving democracy as racist. I don't know whether to laugh or cry.

Such bastions of liberty, justice and respect for minorities as North Korea, Afghanistan, Cuba and Iraq believe – surprise! – that Israel is an apartheid state that is committing genocide against Palestinians, and that its founding principles are based on theories of racial superiority.

As I was saying...

By RON CSILLAG

When it comes to statements about mass murder and racism, I have to admit these countries know whereof they speak.

But from the very start, the fix was in. The World Conference Against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance (a name derived by a committee if ever there was one) really had no place to go but toward racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance. By the time the last in a series of preparatory committees finished meeting in Geneva in July, the rhetoric had been cast in last spring's Tehran Declaration, which singled out Israel as the world's most racist state, revived the Zionism-equals-racism canard and even appropriated the vocabulary of the Holocaust to describe Israeli treatment of Palestinians.

Instead of calls for moderation, Mary Robinson, the UN's high commissioner for human rights, under whose auspices the conference was held, gamely urged dialogue, and reinforced an atmosphere of victimization by pronouncing that the meeting should come to the aid of oppressed peoples everywhere, including, say, the Roma and Palestinians. She had more in mind, but never got past the second reference for the cheers and hoots of approval.

That too was a portent. Those with legitimate grievances at the conference – the Roma, indigenous populations, those with AIDS/HIV and women's groups – were utterly drowned out by the Palestinian din.

There was a good argument made for Canada to attend. Only by being there could we impart the values we hold dear and try to prevent the Rwandas, Serbias and East Timors of the future. Our attendance would encourage governments to enact fair employment laws, clamp down on Internet hate, rethink restrictive immigration quotas and fight racism of every sort.

On one level, that may well happen in some places in Europe and perhaps South America. But in a year, let's check in with the world's top human rights luminaries. Will Iran stop persecuting Jews and Baha'is? Will Iraq stop trying to sneak past the UN-imposed No Fly Zone to bomb its own Kurds? Will Indonesian and Malaysian mobs stop slaughtering Christians (maybe when they run out of them)? Will Syria end its occupation of Lebanon? Will Saudi Arabia allow women to drive? As for Afghanistan, well, enough said.

What an absurd, sorry farce this conference was: Thuggish dictatorships and brutally repressive theocracies ganging up on a country where Muslims, Christians, Druze and members of every minority are free to work, vote, worship, move and say as they wish; which has, proportional to its population, absorbed more persecuted people than any other country in history; where 95 percent of "oppressed" Palestinians are under the direct government of Yasser Arafat.

With this conference, the UN has shamed itself yet again. Canada should be commended for working to soften the language in the final declaration. But knowing in advance the summit's sinister premise and predictable outcome, we should have stayed away altogether. There would have been more honour in that than to consort with hypocrites and racists.

About Parenting

Rebecca Katz

My three-year-old son does not sleep well at night. I am worried his interrupted sleep will cause him to be cranky at school. Actually, I am concerned he will not even make it to school because if he continues to wake me up at night I will be too exhausted to drive him.

On a decent night he wakes only once. He comes to our room and requests a bottle of milk. He then sleeps with us for the remainder of the night.

We do not take him back to his room because he has the lungs of an opera singer and doing so evokes loud shouts of protest from his little body. On a bad night, his yells wake up our one-year-old, who does not fall back to sleep easily.

BabyCenter.com profiles some pediatric sleep experts who have published books on coping with and solving sleeping disorders in children. The doctors include William Sears, Jodi Mindell, Berry Brazelton, and Richard Ferber.

Dr. Shelly Weiss, pediatric neurologist at the Hospital for Sick Children in Toronto, suggests speaking with a pediatrician or family doctor first to be sure there is no medical condition, such as an ear infection, that could be influencing your child's sleep.

I discussed my son's sleeping behaviour with Weiss and Ferber, head of the center for pediatric sleep disorders at Children's Hospital in Boston.

Given the amount of time my son sleeps (11 to 13 hours a day), Ferber believes he is getting plenty of rest and that being too tired for preschool should not be an issue.

Of greater concern to Ferber is that our three-year-old is running our house at night and drinking bottles in bed, as they are not ideal for his teeth or ears.

Ferber advises to give him a bottle at night before brushing his teeth, thereby separating the bottle from his sleep routine.

Weiss recommends gradually scaling back the middle-of-the-night bottles.

This may be accomplished, suggests Weiss, by slowly decreasing the amount of fluids given to the child at night. Eventually the little one's body will not require the extra calories during sleeping hours.

Ferber suggests if we do not want our son wandering our halls at night and crawling into our bed, we should put a gate at his room and keep his door open.

If our son wakes the baby, Ferber advises to focus on getting the little one back to sleep, the older one will soon realize that the threat of waking a sibling does not faze his parents anymore.

'I poured out my soul to God'

On the first day of Rosh Hashanah we read a special Haftorah that relates the story of the birth of the prophet Shmuel. In particular, the story focuses on the disposition and strength of Shmuel's mother, Chana, during events prior to his birth.

Distraught that she is childless, Chana beseeches God silently to help bring her a child: "Chana spoke to her heart. Her lips moved, but no sound was heard."

As she prays, she is observed by the prophet Eli who mistakes her pleading and sense of urgency for inebriation.

"No, my lord," Chana answers the prophet, "I have not drunk any wine; rather, I have poured out my soul to God."

Jewish history is the inspiring record – often piercing, always poignant – of the myriad, diverse "outpourings of our souls" to God, to our fellow Jews and even to the world.

During that history, many have been the languages by which we, the Jewish people, dispersed across continents and seas, have expressed our outpourings.

This year's Rosh Hashanah supplement explores a number of aspects of the nature and diversity of Jewish languages. We are delighted to feature essays that touch upon the pragmatic and the ethereal, the historic and the instructional, the scholarly and the anecdotal. In particular, we have received permission from Ariel, the venerable, much-treasured Israeli Review of Arts and Letters to reproduce articles related to the flowering of Hebrew in modern times. We also publish an adaptation of articles, in abridged form, by the late Sam Bension Maimon, the Sephardi sage of Seattle, from a collection of his writings entitled The Beauty of Sephardic Life: Scholarly, Humorous and Personal Reflections.

We also "introduce" our readers to two local scholars whose submissions appear in The CJN for the first time. Sara R. Horowitz writes on Voices of Jewish Women and B. Glen Rotchin, writes about Poetry: A Canadian Obsession.

In this supplement, readers will notice we do not restrict the definition of Jewish languages to the conventional understanding of language meaning a spoken and written form of communication. That is why, in addition to articles about Hebrew, Yiddish, Ladino and Esperanto, we also publish two articles about the "language" of hope and the "language" of crisis. Rabbi Reuven P. Bulka of Ottawa writes about Hope: a language of its own. Gil Troy of Montreal, pleads with readers that It's time to change the Jewish language of crisis. Both are compelling reading.

Finally, we take special pleasure in including throughout the supplement photos that "speak" about the "language" of tzedakah. Courtesy of UIA Canada and Keren Hayesod, the photos are a remarkable and moving testimony of the responsibility we call tzedakah so deeply embedded into the Jewish soul, taught to each generation since the beginning of our history and so unhesitatingly expressed whenever called upon. The photos are eloquent evidence against the vile, false invective spread last week in Durban against Israel and Judaism.

As we prepare for Rosh Hashanah, perhaps an idea or an expression in this supplement will help us find the words to formulate our own outpourings of the soul. We hope you enjoy these offerings.

The mother of languages

By NORMAN BERDICHEVSKY

What use is Hebrew, an obscure minor language spoken by less than six million people? This is the question often posed by students in most countries who, having gone through a secondary school education, are well aware of the immense respect accorded the classical civilization of Greece and Rome. For those to whom "classical languages" are synonymous with "dead" ones, modern languages at least offer a practical tool to aid study in prestigious professional fields – French, so closely associated with high fashion, cuisine and art; Italian with music and the opera; German with philosophy, medicine and psychology.

The influence of Hebrew on other languages

The negative attitude of the present generation towards foreign languages in general is ironically also present among many Jewish children in the Diaspora, for whom the Hebrew language appears to be of little use outside the synagogue or a visit to Israel. The impression is of an exotic eastern language with no relation to European languages. Moreover, it is a Semitic language with what appears to be an unfamiliar vocabulary, grammar and alphabet. This impression is reinforced by memories of traditionally taught Hebrew classes in the synagogue. In the minds of many parents, this conjures up images of a shabby, ill-lit cheder (room) somewhere in an eastern European shtetl, presided over by a bearded rabbi with a ruler in his hand ready to smack anyone not paying attention, and monotonously teaching by rote.

Yet the stereotypical image of Hebrew as a language of ritual, prayer and Sunday school is totally wrong. It deprives us of an appreciation of the immense debt western civilization owes to the Hebrew language, which is on a par with Greek and Latin. During the Renaissance, Christian scholars took a profound interest in the Old Testament and produced new translations directly from the original Hebrew, rather than using the Vulgate Latin texts. This interest can be seen, for example, in the poetry of William Blake and John Milton (who read and wrote Hebrew fluently) and in Rembrandt's famous painting Writing on the Wall.

The Round Tower in Copenhagen is engraved with the Latin word Doctrinament, and a sword, a heart and God's name (the four Hebrew letters of the Tetragrammaton), indicating that the doctrine of the Protestant monarch was to let his heart be ruled by God's word. The Hebrew letters were there to demonstrate that the king's fidelity was to the "original" word of God in Hebrew rather than an inaccurate translation. This fidelity to the original Hebrew of the holy works had previously been demonstrated by the Christian scholar, Johann Reuchlin (1455-1522), whose study of the Hebrew scriptures resulted in strong support among enlightened clergymen to prevent the burning of the Talmud as a work of heresy.

Both because of a desire to read the Bible in its original tongue and a belief in Hebrew as "the mother of languages," the language figured prominently in the Puritan movement in England, culminating in the Commonwealth under Oliver Cromwell. A motion introduced into the House of Commons in 1649 sought to substitute Saturday as the "true Sabbath" in place of Sunday as the Lord's day. Milton (1608-1674), was a devoted Hebraist and was appointed by Cromwell as secretary for foreign languages. John Selden (1584-1654) was a noted legal scholar whose study of the biblical and talmudic sources of ancient Jewish law (in Hebrew and Aramaic) helped reshape the British system of jurisprudence and establish the privilege of the individual against self-incrimination.

English Puritan emigrants were also instrumental in promoting Hebrew as part of the curriculum in such prominent American universities as Harvard, Columbia, Yale, Brown, Princeton, Johns Hopkins, Dartmouth and Pennsylvania (Yale, Columbia and Dartmouth still bear Hebrew inscriptions on their seals). In Harvard's early years, more time was devoted to the study of Hebrew than Latin or Greek. This role of Hebrew in the curriculum endured until the 1820s. Graduates of the school of divinity had to be able to read the Old Testament in the original Hebrew – a practice still required in Denmark.

Our view of ancient history has been shaped by the enormous role Greece, Rome and Christianity and their bias towards its Jewish origins played in the formation and development of what came to be known as "western civilization." This term is actually a misnomer since many of its most important foundations – monotheism, the Judeo-Christian ethic and the alphabet – originated in the heartland of the Ancient World, which stretched from the Aegean Sea and the Nile Delta across the Levant, Phoenicia, Israel and Mesopotamia (including the kingdoms and empires of Akkadia, Assyria, the Hittites and Babylonia). This view of history is wrongly compartmentalized into separate categories – Ancient Greece, Troy, Egypt, Rome, Israel and Carthage – without a proper understanding and appreciation of the common source of the heritage which was eventually consolidated under the Roman Empire and identified as "western." It was not until the schism in the fifth century between the Orthodox Church based in Constantinople and the Catholic Church in Rome that it became common practice to separate "east" and "west."

•It is now evident that many links existed between the Old Testament and the Hebrew language and the early civilization of Greece and the classic works of the Iliad and the Odyssey. More than 30 years ago, Prof. Cyrus Godon pointed out in his epic work of scholarship, The Common Background of Greek and Hebrew Civilizations, that both drew on a common east Mediterranean heritage with many cross-currents between them. He pointed out that "only two of the ethnic groups that emerged historically in the eastern Mediterranean of the second millennium have enjoyed a historically conscious continuity down to the present: the Greeks and the Hebrews."

This fact had been long ignored because so few scholars were skilled in both Greek and Hebrew. A re-examination of the great works of Hellenic and Hebraic civilization sheds light on similar customs, common aspects of kingship, military strategy and technology, sacrifice, music and the central issues of man's fate as dramatically portrayed both in the Book of Job and the greatest Greek dramas – the problems of evil and suffering. These central elements of "western" civilization originated in the Near East – ancient Israel and Greece (which at that time included Crete, Cyprus and much of Asia Minor).

History is always written by the victors. Rome vanquished Greece, mostly peacefully, and absorbed much of the Greek legacy – mythology, philosophy and laws. Two other rivals, however, were crushed in a series of violent wars – Israel and Carthage. These two shared much of a common Semitic heritage in language and did not accept Rome's claims to a superior civilization. The Phoenicians of Tyre and Sidon had been close allies of the ancient Israelite kingdom and helped King Solomon build the First Temple. Migrants from these two Phoenician cities founded Carthage and preserved their language (originally called Phoenician and later Punic), which was very similar to Hebrew.

Link between ancient Israel, Carthage

The noted Israeli writer Amos Kenan gave expression to this link between ancient Israel and Carthage – Rome's bitterest opponents. In a article titled Envy Tyre, he wrote: "I always had an attraction to this wonderful phenomenon called Tyre and Sidon, and as one who was born on the sands of Tel Aviv on the coastal lowland, I feel a closeness to all that was, is and will be, on the eastern shore of the Mediterranean which I am a part of, and which is a part of me. The Hebrew language, which is my language today, was 4,000 and 3,000 and 2,500 years ago the language spoken in Jerusalem and Tyre, in Shechem and Sidon, in Jaffa and Ugarit... and in Carthage. Tyre and Sidon and Jerusalem were two axes of one culture... the spiritual one of Jerusalem and the material one of Carthage. In the days when the prophets of Israel tried to create a universal code of morality, the seamen of Tyre established their colonies... Why shouldn't we feel a sense of pride in our proximity to that ancient contemporary of ours who stamped his image on the area, gave to the world writing, and once sent his elephants across the Alps under Hannibal's leadership and momentarily brought mighty Rome itself in danger of destruction?"

In addition to their "strange" religion, the Jews' Hebrew language recalled the ancient Punic-speaking Carthaginian foe. It is no wonder that the Romans, who willingly acknowledged their cultural debt to Greece, were loath to grant any credit to the vanquished Jews, Phoenicians and Carthaginians. In contrast to so many other subject peoples under Roman rule, these Semites put up stubborn resistance and even claimed the superiority of monotheism (first Judaism and then Christianity), and were proud of their alphabet, which was borrowed first by the Greeks and later by the Romans. Our alphabet is a direct descendant and still bears the names of the first two letters of the early Phoenician-Hebrew alphabet (alef and bet).

No literate person can expect to read a daily newspaper or listen to a discussion of the arts and sciences, law, psychology, physics, mathematics, military affairs or any other professional field without encountering a wealth of phrases and expression of foreign origin which have become a part of the English language. Expressions such as status quo, casus belli, laissez-faire, déjà vu, savoir-faire, haute cuisine, allegro, pogrom, de facto, de jure, sine qua non, prima facie, modus vivendi, leitmotif, blitzkreig, lebensraum, etc. (yes, even et cetera itself) and thousands more, are part of our everyday language.

The contribution of Hebrew is less obvious but often overlooked precisely because it has become so familiar in its anglicized forms.

Hebrew words in Bible could not always be translated

The foremost Jewish historian of our time, Cecil Roth, had this to say: "Generation after generation of Englishmen heard the Bible read in church and studied it at home. In many cases, it was the only book; in all, the principal book. At last its cadences, its music, its phraseology, sank into his mind and became part of his being... Hence by slow degrees his daily speech was not merely enriched, but to some extent moulded by its influence."

Without a knowledge of Hebrew and its majestic cadence and imagery, we are apt to assume that certain modes of expression simply derived from old Anglo-Saxon speech, but the translation of the Bible into English directly from Hebrew exercised a major influence over the English language. When we use expressions such as a "heavy heart" or idioms like "the skin of his teeth," "a drop in the bucket," or employ certain superlatives – "Holy of Holies" (Kodesh Hakedushim), King of Kings (Melech Hamalachim), Song of Songs (Shir Hashirim) – we are simply repeating a word-for-word translation of the Hebrew Bible.

Hebrew words from the Bible could not always be translated, but were simply "adopted," with only a minor alteration in pronunciation – alphabet, Sabbath, amen, abbot, messiah, hallelujah, hosanna, manna, cherubim, seraphim, Satan, shibboleth, leviathan, mammon, horn, carmel, jubilee (from the 50th year yovel celebration when all slaves were to be set free), scallions (after Ashkelon), gauze (after Gaza), and sodomy (after Sdom), Armageddon (from Megiddo), behemoth (the term for wild animals which was probably the source of the name Bahama islands) and most surprising of all, probably Europe itself (after the Hebrew erev, meaning setting sun or evening). Europe was the land of the setting sun for the ancient Hebrews and Phoenicians.

Many Hebrew words were later absorbed by Yiddish and became part of the linguistic baggage of Jewish immigrants that became widely known by gentile neighbours and eventually adopted into English and other languages, such as maven (expert), ganef (thief), chutzpah (cheek), mishpachah (family), kosher and many others.

Many of the most common personal (Christian) names used throughout the world are directly derived from Hebrew, such as Jonathan (Yonatan), Joseph (Yosef), David, Isaac (Yitzhak), Jacob or Jack (Yaakov), Sarah, Esther, Eve, Rachel, Deborah, Rebecca (Rivka) and Leah. The last reigning emperor of Ethiopia inherited the title of Lion of Judah (claiming descent from King Solomon and the Queen of Sheba) and chose the name Haile Selassie (hayl hashlosha – in Hebrew, the power of the Trinity). The Puritans held the Hebrew language in such regard that their military banners were inscribed with the emblem of the Lion of Judah and their battle hymns were taken directly from the Psalms.

Some Hebrew words of biblical origin were so distinctive that no attempt was made to find equivalents for them in English or in the other languages which likewise adopted them. One of them, shibboleth, described a biblical story which had very modern applications, directly repeating the biblical event.

Shibboleth (the Hebrew word for an "ear of corn") was pronounced with the "sh" sound by the Gideonites, whereas the hostile tribe of Ephraimites could not say the "sh" and pronounced it sibboleth. The self-same strategy of detection was used in a peasants' revolt in Flanders in the town of Brugge (Bruges) in the 13th century. The Flemish-speaking peasants distinguished their comrades from French-speaking nobility who were clad in peasant garb by asking them to repeat the Flemish slogan "Friend and Shield." The

Hebrew's influence is profound

French speakers could not pronounce the "sch" in the Flemish word for shield. A similar shibboleth technique was used in World War II by the Dutch resistance and British intelligence to uncover German SS officers pretending to be Dutch civilians, who were unable to pronounce the name of the town of Scheveningen.

The influence of the Hebrew language, however, extends far beyond the field of linguistics and religion. Its contribution is much more profound than the borrowing of individual words and concepts. Hebrew mental patterns have been so long encased in English words and phrases that we scarcely give a thought to their origins. Classics of English literature (both prose and poetry), political oratory, the popular stage, song and screen, and inscriptions on historical monuments are strewn with titles lifted directly from the pages of the Old Testament where they appeared for the first time in Hebrew. Their ability to serve as allegories, proverbs and parables for modern situations and events that recall the Bible has been a hallmark of great literature, debate and oratory.

Just a few examples will suffice: the writing on the wall (Daniel, 5:25), the mark of Cain (Genesis, 4:15), scapegoat (Leviticus, 16:26), the meek shall inherit the earth (Psalms 37:11), the grapes of wrath (Deuteronomy, 32:32), out of the mouths of babes and sucklings (Psalms 8:3), the good earth (Deuteronomy, 6:18), the way of all flesh (Genesis, 6:12), dust to dust (Genesis, 3:19), feet of clay (Daniel, 2:34), east of Eden (Genesis, 4:16), how are the mighty fallen (2 Samuel 1:19), man shall not live by bread alone (Deuteronomy, 8:3)... To imagine the English language without them is as unthinkable as to imagine English without the influence of Shakespeare.

At the same time, a number of curious mistranslations have entered English-speaking lore. The most famous is that of keren ("ray," "beam," or "horn"). As a result of the translation into Latin as "horn," generations of artists misrepresented Moses the great lawgiver as possessing horns, while his face should have been depicted as radiating rays of light! The Red Sea, indeed a deep blue, should have been the Reed Sea, from the Hebrew Yam Suf.

Although Hebrew ceased to be the spoken language of the majority of Jews in their Judean homeland between the second century BCE and the second century CE, it remained the central language of Jewish religious commentary, and heavily influenced the hybrid languages that arose in the Diaspora, such as Yiddish (Judeo-German), Ladino or Judezmo (Judeo-Spanish), Yevanic (Judeo-Greek), Zarphatic (Judeo-French), Ebri (Judeo-Persian), Moghrabi (Judeo-Arabic) and others, all of which continued to use Hebrew letters. It is estimated that Hebrew words comprise close to 15 percent of the Yiddish vocabulary and a somewhat lesser proportion in the other hybrids. Many Hebrew words which were absorbed by Yiddish indicate specific religious beliefs and practices. But a parallel vocabulary developed, in which words of Hebrew origin were used specifically to designate a concept, occupation, ceremony or item with Jewish content as opposed to the parallel word of foreign origin.

For a time, lively rivalry existed between Hebrew and Yiddish

For a time, a lively rivalry existed between Hebrew and Yiddish, and they competed for the loyalty of several generations of literary figures, writers, playwrights and philosophers. Supporters boldly proclaimed Yiddish as a Jewish national language at a famous conference in Czernowitz in 1908, pointing to the tremendous numerical superiority of Yiddish speakers. Hebraists, on the other hand, at their conference in Vienna in 1913, laid claim to Hebrew as the Jewish national language, emphasizing the superiority of its historical continuity, the immense prestige of the Bible, its influence upon much of European literature and its venerable age. It is hard to imagine a more persuasive Zionist argument than that the Land of Israel "speaks" Hebrew through the countless inscriptions uncovered throughout its length and breadth on parchment, stone, clay, papyrus and wood.

Yiddish progressively lost strength because of emigration and assimilation, while Hebrew grew in strength due to territorial concentration through migration to Palestine and then Israel. Yiddish reflected the folkways and religious life of the mass of European Jews and later was adapted to meet the requirements of sophisticated urban life and modern literature. The Holocaust dealt it a death-blow as a spoken language (other than among some Orthodox Jews), although there has been an academic revival in its study, and as late at 1978, the Nobel Prize for Literature was awarded to the Yiddish writer, Isaac Bashevis Singer.

The originator of the international language Esperanto, Dr. Lazar Ludwig Zamenof, was a Jew whose knowledge of Hebrew undoubtedly played a role in the successful development of the only devised language to make the transition from a desk project to a living tongue. Although the Esperanto vocabulary is largely derived from the Romance, Germanic and Slavic families, it is likely that Zamenhof's profound knowledge of Hebrew and Aramaic contributed to the logical structure of what all linguists recognize as the easiest language to learn.

Zamenhof created Esperanto in the hope that it would become not just an international language for everyone but a new national language for the Jewish people. He loved both Yiddish and Hebrew but felt that Yiddish lacked historical continuity and prestige and that Hebrew was too difficult to adapt to the needs of the modern world. It must be remembered that at the time Zamenhof began working on Esperanto in the 1880s, Eliezer Ben-Yehuda's efforts to revive Hebrew were still in their infancy.

Esperanto created as new language for Jewish people

The success in transforming Hebrew into a living language and the development of a modern literature have long inspired proponents of "minor" languages, overshadowed by powerful neighbours. Proponents of Welsh, Erse (Irish), Gaelic and Basque have visited Israel specifically to observe the operation of the teaching methods used in the Hebrew ulpan – intensive language courses taught to new immigrants in a "Hebrew in Hebrew" environment. Proponents of Maltese as a national language sought to encourage and inspire their people to take pride in their language as a close relative of Hebrew and Aramaic – the tongues of Jesus and his disciples.

Many scholars during the Renaissance and later under the sponsorship of several monarchs, such as James IV of Scotland, tried to establish Hebrew as "the mother of all languages." They believed that Hebrew was the original source from which all other languages developed. It was for this reason that Christopher Columbus brought Luis de Torres, a Converso (Jewish convert to Catholicism) with him on his voyage to the Americas. De Torres was a skilled interpreter who first addressed the Indians they met in Hebrew. The assumption was that such far-flung peoples were probably related to the ten lost tribes of Israel and therefore must have been influenced by the Hebrew language. De Torres remained in the New World and is thought to have been responsible for the origin of "turkey" as the name for the strange new bird he observed – a corruption of the Hebrew tukki (parrot).

This view of Hebrew as the origin of all the language families was subsequently repudiated as simplistic. However, some recent scholarship has indicated the possibility that Hebrew is indeed much older than the other Semitic languages. Its geographic location at the crossroads of the three continents of the Old World may have resulted in its having been an important source for other language families. Hebrew's sister languages – first Akkadian and then Aramaic – functioned for a time as the lingua franca of the Near East.

The concept of a single origin of languages is known as "monogenesis." It rests on the idea that originally the root meanings of Hebrew words were conveyed by a single syllable of two consonants rather than the three consonants recognizable today. These syllables underwent changes which can be explained by the similarities in the position of the tongue in pronouncing certain sound combinations. The monosyllable sounds formed by these consonants describe the same action in several major language families. This highly controversial theory, which sets out hundreds of such syllable combinations shared by Hebrew and other languages, claims that Hebrew is the likely single origin of several major language families.

To know Hebrew is to enjoy direct access to one of the world's oldest continuous cultures. For the Jewish people, it is perhaps the most crucial element of their unity. The Bible and the works which followed – the Talmud, the Mishnah – were written in Hebrew and Aramaic. In principle, every Jew could be learned, and the people were encouraged by their rabbis to be literate in Hebrew.

Hebrew provides direct access to the Bible

More than 60 years ago, Mordechai Kaplan, one of the great Jewish thinkers of the 20th century, and founder of the Reconstructionist Movement in the United States, in one of his works, argued that: "Once Hebrew becomes a foreign or ancient tongue to the Jew, he ceases to experience any intimacy with Jewish life... the first practical step in any effort to live Judaism as a civilization should be to learn Hebrew. It should be included among the languages that Jewish children are taught in the high schools and colleges, and it should be given the same academic credit as Latin and Greek."

Knowledge of Hebrew provides direct access to the Bible, over 3,000 years of cultural creativity, a better understanding of the development of English and even a possible key to comparative linguistics, an appreciation of the biblical heritage in modern literature, cinema, song, art, oratory and politics, and an insight into the moral, ethical, religious and judicial foundations of what we know today as western civilization.

Last, but by no means least, Hebrew is the language of modern Israel and an indispensable key to understanding and appreciating Israeli society and culture. Although in the Israeli linguistic marketplace, English will undoubtedly continue to enjoy immense prestige, the day is not far off – sometime in the 21st century – when a majority of the Jewish people in the world will be Hebrew-speaking Israelis. For Jews in the Diaspora, Hebrew remains important as part of their religious heritage, but increasingly it will also function as a window to Israel, and a key to their own cultural heritage.

How Hebrew came to be the language of Israel

By RABBI SHLOMO JAKOBOVITS

Everyone knows that the language of Israel is Hebrew. But most of us are unaware that this did not come about automatically. For many years, the matter of national language was in doubt, and those who advocated Hebrew had to fight long and hard to achieve their goal.

Original Israelites Spoke Hebrew

Those years of doubt and struggle occurred in the latter part of the 19th and the early part of the 20th centuries, when Jews were returning to their historic homeland, and the New Yishuv (modern settlement of the land) was in its formative years. In contrast, during the first settlement, in the days of Joshua, then the judges and later the kings, there was never any doubt. Hebrew was the undisputed vernacular of the Israelites, and under their rule, it became the language of the land. It had its own script, the script of the Tanach (Bible) and of official and private correspondence of those days.

This situation prevailed until the land was conquered by Babylonia in 586 BCE, when these invaders destroyed the Jewish kingdom and its cities, including Jerusalem and the Temple. The population was exiled to Babylonia, and Jews found themselves living in a land whose tongue was Aramaic, a language somewhat related to Hebrew yet distinct from it and with a different script.

Second Temple Era

Fifty years later, Jews were allowed to return to their land, and several waves of settlers did indeed undertake this journey. Thus Judea – the name accorded to Eretz Yisrael by the Romans – was re-established as the Jewish State, and about 20 years after the arrival of the first wave of returning Jews, the Temple was rebuilt. Hebrew again became the predominant language, but with the infusion of some Babylonian influences. Aramaic script now replaced the earlier Hebrew letters, and Babylonian names were adopted for the months of the Jewish calendar. Two of the later books of the Tanach that were written at this time, Daniel and Ezra, are largely in Aramaic.

Long after the Babylonian Empire had fallen, Aramaic continued to be the lingua franca of the many lands that had earlier constituted that empire. It made inroads even in the land of Israel. Hebrew was still the language of communication, but it was a modified Hebrew, somewhat influenced by Aramaic. The most important manifestation of this modified Hebrew is the Mishnah, which was composed during the centuries just before and just after the second destruction of Jerusalem.

Under Byzantine Rule

Not only did Aramaic influence the Hebrew language and totally change its script, but in due course, it displaced Hebrew as the popular means of communication. Thus the Jerusalem Talmud, written in the three centuries after the compilation of the Mishnah, is in Aramaic, not Hebrew.

This was the era of Byzantine Christian rule over Eretz Yisrael, which lasted until the Arab conquest in 638. Most of the socio-economic upper classes of this period spoke Greek, and sometimes Latin, but the broader masses spoke Aramaic, as did the rabbis. Hebrew did not regain its former position until the 20th century, and then only after intense campaigning.

The Byzantines were intensely anti-Jewish, and their rule was oppressive. Jews rejoiced when the Arabs took over, but by that time most Jews had left the land. Under Muslim rule, the Jewish population increased, but only slightly and very gradually.

Arabic Replaces Aramaic

In due course, Arabic replaced Aramaic and Greek as the Jewish vernacular in Eretz Yisrael; Arabic also became the lingua franca of the surrounding lands. In the larger towns and villages, within Eretz Yisrael and also around it, there were small pockets of Jews who were conversant with Hebrew. This classical Hebrew – with no adaptation to changing times and no mechanism for coining new words and expressions as needed – was substantially different from the Hebrew of modern Israel.

Hebrew was still alive in the world of rabbinic literature and correspondence, but only as a written, not as a spoken, medium. This Hebrew usually manifested a strong admixture of Aramaic, and it also did not, in its existing form, have the potential for becoming the future spoken language.

So the predominant language in Palestine – as Eretz Yisrael came to be generally called – was now Arabic, and for more than 1,000 years after the Arab conquest, the language situation in Palestine hardly changed.

From time to time, individual Jews or small groups made aliyah, and they either melded into the existing linguistic environment or retained the languages of their lands of origin. The Crusaders occupied parts of the land for two centuries, and they used the European tongues of their home countries. The Ottoman Turks became masters of the land in the 15th century and imposed Turkish as the language of government. Ladino was brought into the land by Jews from Mediterranean countries, especially after the expulsion from Spain. But by and large, Arabic prevailed throughout this period as the main language of both Arabs and Jews, with only a sprinkling of Hebrew-speaking Jews here and there.

Jewish Immigration Increases

Matters changed after the late 18th century, as larger waves of Jews made aliyah. Some of the newcomers were Sephardim, and among these, a considerable number spoke Hebrew. But the majority were Ashkenazim from eastern Europe, and their language was Yiddish. By the late 1800s, Yiddish was the most widely spoken language among Palestinian Jews, and some of its adherents ultimately voiced strong opposition to the adoption of Hebrew as the language of daily communication.

Observant Jews credited for keeping Hebrew alive

An early advocate of Hebrew as the vernacular of a re-established Jewish State was Yehuda Alkali. The rabbi of Semlin, a town in Serbia, he was totally committed to strict Jewish observance and deeply steeped in Talmud and Kabbalah. In the 1840s and 1850s, he promulgated Zionist ideas that others espoused half a century later. He spoke forcefully of auto-emancipation – without using the actual term – long before Leon Pinsker's work by that name was published in 1882. Among Alkali's other plans for Eretz Yisrael later adopted by others was a return to agriculture and the establishment of a Jewish army. But his teachings proved to be premature, and in his day, neither the religious establishment nor the secular could accept his ideas. Rabbinical authorities in both in Eretz Yisrael and the Diaspora totally rejected his teachings, including the proposition to establish Hebrew as the spoken language.

Observant Jewry had kept Hebrew alive throughout the centuries by using it in the daily practice of Judaism. Yet when the question of national language became pertinent, this segment of Jewry, by and large, did not urge the adoption of Hebrew. For the overwhelming majority of observant Jews, Yiddish was the medium of expression, and they were quite content to reserve Hebrew for religious purposes only.

Attitudes Varied Widely

So it fell to the secularists to press the cause. And among secular leaders and writers, there were also those who were indifferent or even opposed to Hebrew.

The First Zionist Congress was held in 1897. It advocated the establishment of a Jewish State, but did not take up the question of language. Theodor Herzl himself later expressed the view that those who came to live in that state would bring their own languages with them, and he deemed it likely that the German language would prevail. The early Zionist congresses were conducted mainly in German. It may be worthy of note that at the time, Kaiser Wilhelm II of Germany was the only head of state who met with Herzl and actively supported establishment of a Jewish State in Palestine.

The keynote speaker at that first congress was Nathan Birnbaum, who, like Herzl, was a Vienna journalist. It was he who, 12 years earlier, had coined the expression Zionism. He was an ardent advocate of Yiddish, and in 1908, he initiated a conference in Czernowitz that was attended by many Yiddish writers and teachers. The aim was to declare Yiddish to be the national language of Jewry. But by that time, the status of Hebrew in the Land of Israel was such that the conference was persuaded to modify its resolution to declare Yiddish to be a (not the) national language of Jewry.

But while some early leaders of Zionism showed little disposition toward Hebrew, there were indeed significant stirrings of Hebrew revival at that time, and even earlier. Various secular Hebrew journals appeared from 1870 onwards in Europe and in the Land of Israel itself, such as HaMaggid, HaSchachar and HaChavatzelet. Readership was limited, but the idea of Hebrew as a language of general expression was taking root.

Alliance Israélite Universelle most influential body of the new arrivals trained themselves to speak Hebrew and established a few Hebrew kindergartens. This aliyah was closely associated with the Chovevei Tzion and Bilu movements. Bilu was the first organization to take up the cause of Hebrew revival as a group. This First Aliyah established what came to be known as the New Yishuv, a modern society quite distinct from the Old Yishuv, which traditionally had subsisted mainly on the charity of world Jewry. It was to the New Yishuv that the advocates of Hebrew looked as the future ground where this revived ancient language could flourish.

The Key Figures

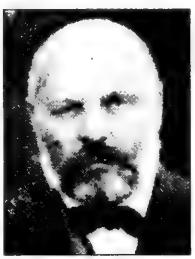
Three individuals stand out as instrumental in deciding the language question, though they were by no means alone. These three, in the order of their importance are: Eliezer Ben Yehuda, Menachem Ussishkin and Asher Ginsberg (Achad Ha'am).

Ben Yehuda dedicated himself to the revival of Hebrew with rare single-mindedness and exceptional self-sacrifice. At an early age, he published several articles in scholarly journals, and it was through the influence of these writings that the Bilu settlers decided to make Hebrew their everyday language.

Eliezer Ben Yehuda

He married at the age of 23 and immediately left Europe to live in cramped quarters in Jerusalem. The year was 1881, which coincided with the First Aliyah. He and his wife chose a life of material deprivation, and both shared a burning enthusiasm for the promotion of Hebrew revival in the ancient land. They established a policy that in their own home, Hebrew was to be the only medium. Any visitor who could not speak Hebrew had to communicate by gesture or otherwise, but no foreign language was permitted. Ben Yehuda supported himself through Hebrew journalism, and in 1908, he published his own daily newspaper, the first secular Hebrew daily of professional quality.

Ben Yehuda was born to a chassidic family, but his father died when he was five and he was not educated to adhere to Jewish observance. In Jerusalem, however, he and his wife returned to a life of tradition in order not to be different from their neighbours, all of whom were of the Old Yishuv. Eliezer grew a beard and payot and his wife donned a sheitl. But those neighbours turned against him anyway when they realized that his advocacy of Hebrew was for secular and nationalistic purposes. He then became rabidly anti-religious, and this in turn fuelled the antagonism of the Old Yishuv against the entire movement for Hebrew revival.



Menachem Ussishkin

At that time, the largest and most influential organization for Jewish welfare and education was the Alliance Israélite Universelle, based in Paris. It set up schools and training centres for Jews in scores of cities, especially around the Mediterranean, including several in Palestine. The Jerusalem Alliance school, impressed with Ben Yehuda's knowledge in several fields, invited him to teach. He set the condition that his language of instruction must be Hebrew in all subjects, not French, as was the usual mode in Alliance schools. The school agreed, and this use of Hebrew was a breakthrough. In later years, when the question of language was debated on a national level, the Alliance strongly opposed Hebrew.

Even then, in 1883, the opposition to instruction in Hebrew made itself felt: Ben Yehuda was frequently jeered and booed on this way to and from his teaching assignment. The extremists of the Old Yishuv took their hostility even further, deliberately mistranslating a paragraph he had written about the battle for Hebrew. They distorted it to impart the impression that he was calling for battle against the Turkish empire, and then they reported this to the Turkish authorities who arrested him and sentenced him to imprisonment. The immediate repercussion was worldwide revulsion and an outcry on his behalf, whereupon the Turks quickly released him.

Neither this nor any of many other impediments phased Ben Yehuda. His goal was the revival of Hebrew and he pressed forward relentlessly. The task required work on several fronts. First he had to update the language so that it would cover all new situations. As far as possible, he sought to render modern Hebrew akin to the biblical tongue rather than to the modified Hebrew of a later era. But many words and phrases not found in the Tanach had to be newly created to meet modern needs, and he con-always agree with him. For example, after he coined the Hebrew verb talfen, to telephone, based on the European equivalent, later authorities wanted a more Hebraic root and instituted the term sach-rechok. In this particular case, the former expression is more widely used today.As new terminology was created, he promulgated it through a stream of books and articles that flowed from his pen. At the same time, he worked on his Dictionary of the Hebrew Language, which contained all the known existing words and idioms plus the new ones. This was an exceptionally detailed compendium, and after his death, the completed work was published in 17 volumes.

Asher Ginsberg (Achad Ha'am)

He also saw the need for a permanent scholarly entity that would undertake the task of language creation and supervision. Such a body would work with him during his lifetime and then continue after him. Accordingly, in 1890, in consort with other leading scholars, he established the Va'ad Halashon (language council), which has continued to exist under varying names, and today functions as a government-chartered council. It was this va'ad that decided, on Ben Yehuda's initiative, to adopt the Sephardi pronunciation.

Above all, Ben Yehuda resolved to do all in his power to induce people in Palestine to use Hebrew as their everyday mode of expression. To this end, he produced impassioned speeches and articles, and influenced many by his personal example.

Modern Hebrew Literature

The ultimate success of Ben Yehuda's efforts would not have been possible without significant help from many contemporaries. Hebrew writers used the new terms coined by Ben Yehuda and at the same time, raised the level of Hebrew usage and awareness.

Outstanding among these writers is Achad Ha'am, and the Hebrew literature of the period is often termed the Age of Achad Ha'am. He was a contemporary of Ben Yehuda, but lived in Palestine only the last five years of his life. Before that, he visited the Holy Land several times, and his influence there was substantial. His fluency in Hebrew and the quality of his writings, both in content and in mode of expression, gave him the power to exert great impact on linguistic developments in the land.

While the proponents of Hebrew laboured assiduously for their cause, those who opposed them also worked hard. Some decisive administrative action was needed to tip the scales,

Four months were pivotal in batttle for Hebrew and the man for that role was Menachem Ussishkin. Influenced by Achad Ha'am, Ussishkin became a keen Hebraist and a leading Zionist. He visited Kishinev immediately after the 1903 pogroms, and, deeply moved, proceeded to spend four months in Palestine.

Palestine Educational Scene

Those four months turned out to be pivotal in the battle for Hebrew. Until that time, the grade-schools of Palestine were in no way co-ordinated, and the language of instruction was mandated by the sponsoring organization in each case. Some schools taught in Hebrew, more in Yiddish. Several Sephardi schools used Ladino, while some used Arabic, and in the Alliance schools the medium was French. Schools sponsored by the Hilfsverein der Deutschen Juden used German, those financed by British or American Jews used English, and there were other languages as well.

Ussishkin called a nationwide meeting of teachers and established the Palestine Teachers' Association. This proved to be a surprisingly powerful organization, and under Ussishkin's guidance, its members resolved that all grade-school instruction other than foreign language subjects should be in Hebrew. Implementation was to be phased in over a period of years. Opposition was widespread and intense, but the association prevailed in most cases, and the new generation grew up speaking Hebrew, at least in grade-school.

The beit din (court) of the Edah Haredit – loosely, the Ashkenazi segment of the Old Yishuv – pronounced a cherem (ban) on all persons who used Hebrew for any functions other than religion. This ban had some impact, but for only a limited time.

Palestine at this time had one institution of post-secondary education, the quasi-academic agricultural school of Mikve Yisrael, where the instruction was in French. Creation of a more comprehensive college, the Haifa Technion, was organized in 1911, with Achad Ha'am on the board and major financing by the German Hilfsverein.

The building was dedicated in 1913, and when it was announced that instruction would be in German, Achad Ha'am resigned from the board and demonstrations in favour of Hebrew took place in several locations. Among the demonstrators was Moshe Shertok (Sharet), then in high school. The furor delayed the opening of the school, and the project came to a standstill with the outbreak of war in 1914. When the British captured Haifa, they sequestered the building as enemy property and then gave it to the Zionist Organization. The result was Hebrew instruction at the Technion. Some academics had wanted German to be the language of instruction at the Hebrew University, which then was in the planning stages, but the Technion saga persuaded them to withdraw that proposal.

The Final Moves

There was yet another confrontation ahead. In the Russia of 1917, immediately after overthrow of the Czar, there were several meetings of Yiddishists. As in 1908, the aim was to proclaim Yiddish as the national language of Jewry. Since there were eight million Jews in eastern Europe and only 70,000 in Palestine, such a resolution could readily overshadow whatever Hebrew had by then achieved in its own land.

Ussishkin was the man who fought this battle, and it was a bitter and difficult process. But his erudite and impressive speeches won the day, and the status of Hebrew came through unchallenged.

Two years later, Ussishkin spoke at the Paris Peace Conference on the question of the National Jewish Home.

Addressed world in Hebrew

He addressed the assembled nations of the world in Hebrew – with interpreters, of course, translating each sentence into English and French – and this was the first occasion in recorded history where such an event occurred.

In that same year, he and Ben Yehuda met with Sir Herbert Samuel, the new high commissioner for Palestine. It was a foregone conclusion that English and Arabic would be officially adopted by Mandatory Palestine. Still to be settled was the question of the Jewish language or languages. They wanted Hebrew, and only Hebrew, to become the additional official language. Based on statistics, Yiddish and Ladino could justifiably share that status with Hebrew, but they successfully argued in favour of the biblical tongue, and Sir Herbert proclaimed Hebrew as the official Jewish language of Palestine.

That proclamation was renewed with Israel's Declaration of Independence on May 14, 1948. By now there is no longer any question about it.

Hebrew in the former Soviet Union

By SEYMOUR EPSTEIN

I have a vivid memory of a gathering that took place in Kharkov, Ukraine, in 1990. A group of Jewish men and women dressed in shabby clothing met in a typical apartment of the period furnished with equally shabby wood and metal items. The occasion was a meeting of Kharkov's Hebrew Teachers' Union. The leader, a 17-year-old named Zev Elkin (now completing a doctorate in Karaite literature at the Hebrew University), conducted the meeting in Hebrew. Though important issues were discussed, whenever a word was lacking or a bit of dikduk (grammar) was in dispute, the discussion was stopped for a debate on the fine points of modern Hebrew usage. Time out at the drop of a hitpael!! And the Russians know how to debate…

When my JDC (Joint Distribution Committee) colleague, Asher Ostrin, having ascertained that Elkin had been studying Hebrew for less than two years, expressed amazement at his fluency (comparing it to his own less-fluent Hebrew of many years), he was told: "Oh, but you didn't study Hebrew in Kharkov!"

At the time of glasnost and perestroika, Kharkov was home to hundreds of adults studying Hebrew in the most challenging (even threatening) surroundings and hundreds more on a waiting list because of a lack of teachers and available classrooms. Elkin and his colleagues were literally leading a language revolution.

Some years later in a Moscow hotel, I was interviewing a Hebrew teacher who wished to study in an advanced course for Jewish educators at Hebrew University. From Tashkent, Uzbekistan, she told me that she was an engineer (that ubiquitous Soviet job description) in a factory. One day soon after Uzbeki independence was declared, her boss announced that all conversations in the factory would now be in Uzbeki rather than Russian, her native tongue. That day she registered for an ulpan to study Hebrew!

As the last years of the 20th century waned and I travelled more in the territories of the former Soviet Union (FSU) and also encountered more Russian Jews at home in Jerusalem, I began to compare this fin de siècle Hebrew phenomenon with the last Russian-inspired Hebrew revolution at the end of the 19th and the beginning of the 20th century.

As you read the essays of Achad Ha'am (Asher Ginsberg) or the stories and poems of Chaim Nachman Bialik and Shaul Tchernichovsky, you realize that these men who were born in the Pale of Russian settlement wrote in Hebrew but thought Russian thoughts, influenced by the literature and philosophy of their first homeland. As you thumb through Eliezer Ben Yehuda's dictionary (coined a milon by him), you wonder at the persistence of this man,

'Perelman gave birth to a trend that became a norm'

born in 1858 in Lushki, near Vilna. In changing his name to Ben Yehuda, Eliezer Perelman gave birth to a trend that under David Ben- Gurion (David Gruen back in Russian Poland) became a norm: the Hebraization of Galut names.

I remember meeting an old professor in Akademgoradok, Siberia, who had quietly kept up his Hebrew studies from a childhood in prewar Poland. Secretly, over many years, he wrote a translation of, and commentary on, Kohelet, that enigmatic megillah read on Sukkot. Only in the freer atmosphere of the 1990s did he dare publish it, as he began work on another biblical book.

The author, left, with a senior citizen of Irkutsk

So many of the Hebrew language revolutionaries of the 19th and early 20th centuries were trained for professions unrelated to their ultimate life task. Tchernichovski was a doctor, Achad Ha'am, a tea merchant; Ben Yehuda studied medicine, but graduated as a teacher from the Alliance Israélite Universelle in Paris. There is no doubt that their professional training, their exposure to Russian culture and their fascination with Western philosophy influenced their approach to Hebrew language and culture. When Russian Jews hear old Zionist songs from the Yishuv for the first time, they laugh in the realization that most of the melodies are Russian.

Trained for professions unrelated to their ultimate life task

This phenomenon was also quite evident in the latest "Russian revolution." Engineers, computer scientists, geologists, art historians and musicians (all well trained at the best Soviet institutions of higher learning) brought to their new love of Hebrew a variety of backgrounds that enhanced their new work. Imagine the scene when a Russian musician first learns about the traditional cantillation notes of the Torah or a Moscow-trained philologist encounters the intricacies of Hebrew grammar.

There was, of course, one striking difference between the Russians of old and our "new Jews" of the FSU. Achad Ha'am's parents were Chassidim; Bialik's father was a Talmud scholar. Ben Yehuda's father was Lubavitch. Most of the men who, with their writing and speaking, revived the Hebrew language and turned it into a modern tongue came from deep Jewish roots. Some had learned Hebrew and Yiddish before Russian, but all had received a full education in classical Jewish texts.

In glaring contrast, none of the current Russian Hebraists and Jewish educators had any prior Jewish learning, either at school or at home. Their parents were communists, and even their grandparents were removed from Jewish culture by the anti-Semitic persecutions of the Soviet regime. While the Hebrew literati had positive memories of their Jewishness, these "new Jews" have memories of insecurity, inferiority and stigma.

The legacy of Ben Yehuda and Bialik – the complete revival of Hebrew as a spoken language and the creation of a new literature that tranforms the idiom of the Bible and the Mishnah into a language of daily life – is a linguistic miracle. Yet inherent in that wondrous development is a nagging dilemma. Has a holy tongue been vulgarized, or has daily parlance been sanctified? This philological question and its echo in other domains (our history, spiritual life, literary heritage, indeed our future) has created its own tension within Israeli society.

In the meantime, there are other questions: Will the Jews of the FSU who have become the new lovers of Hebrew and teachers of Judaica bring a fresh approach to this old problem? Will their varied backgrounds and tabula rasa Jewishness liberate them to think radically of innovative paths in Jewish life?

Mi yodea?

Seymour Epstein (Epi), the executive director of the UJA-Federation Board of Jewish Education in Toronto, worked for the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee from 1981 to 1999 and spent most of the 1990s travelling to the former Soviet Union to help revive Jewish life in newly emerging Jewish communities.

Hebrew: its present and future

By MARTIN LOCKSHIN

Of all the developments in the Jewish world in the 20th century, the creation of the State of Israel is surely the most wondrous. I often imagine how shocked my great-grandparents would be by the State that is now so well established, strong and creative. And of all the "miracles" associated with the founding of the State, the successful revival of the Hebrew language might be the biggest surprise.

For close to 2,000 years, Hebrew was not the language of daily communication for Jews in any Jewish community in the world. Certainly it was read and studied and venerated. Jews never stopped writing in Hebrew. But it was not a spoken language and was not available as a vehicle for conducting daily life.

In fact, the status of the Hebrew language between the third and 19th centuries was very much like that of Latin. Latin was venerated; Latin was studied. People wrote in Latin; people prayed in Latin. In fact, the number of people who read Latin, studied Latin, prayed in Latin and venerated Latin was always higher than the parallel numbers for Hebrew. Yet the idea of turning Latin today into a language of daily communication is unimaginable.

But that is just what modern-day Zionists succeeded in doing with Hebrew. Jewish naysayers scoffed and mocked and suggested that a language that had been, for all intents and purposes, dead for 1,700 years, could not evolve from a language of prayer into a language of culture and speech. In the 1920s, the vision of establishing a University of Jerusalem that would be a Hebrew University, that could teach science and mathematics in Hebrew, was a very hard sell. Even the dreamer Theodor Herzl never accepted the idea of a revived Hebrew language. He was certain that the best plan for the state that he wanted to establish was for Jews to continue to speak the languages they had spoken before moving to Israel.

Spoken by over 5 million Jews

But now we know that Hebrew has "won." More than five million Jews in the world speak the language today. Statisticians believe that in a few more years, more Jews will speak Hebrew than any other language. (Currently, there are marginally more English-speaking than Hebrew-speaking Jews.) A vibrant culture of Hebrew novels, poetry, music, theatre, television, radio, newspapers and magazines exists in Israel and, to some degree, outside of Israel.

In these difficult days when we worry about the safety and security of the State, at least one Zionist accomplishment seems safe and secure. The Hebrew language is here to stay. There are probably more Jews who read and speak Hebrew today than in any other period of history.

Yet there are causes for concern.

The first is the question of language "purity." Much of what passes for Hebrew these days is simply not Hebrew.

Most linguists argue that there is no such thing as language purity. Already in the 12th century, Moses Maimonides realized this truth. He wrote that the only way to measure "correct" speaking or writing in a language is if its speakers speak or write that way. If, Maimonides wrote, "Hebrew speakers in their own land, I mean in Eretz Yisrael" speak a certain way, then, by definition, that speech becomes proper Hebrew (Commentary on the Mishnah, on Mishnah Terumot 1:1).

English has been absorbed into spoken Hebrew, and even into written Hebrew, at an astounding rate. As English-speakers, often the hardest words for us to identify when we read a Hebrew text are the English-loan words that we just don't expect to be there. And they don't just appear in slang and uneducated Hebrew.

Like every spoken language in the world, Hebrew uses hundreds or thousands of "international" words – like Internet, radioactivi, telefon, televizia and contsert. There are good reasons for words like this to remain the same across the globe.

But a glance at two or three pages of a recent edition of the literary section of Ha'aretz (often considered to be the repository of the best, "highest" Hebrew) reveals dozens of English words that are not at all international in character. Words like effectivi, relevanti or understatement are vexing to purists who know that there are perfectly good Hebrew ways of saying "effective" "relevant" or "understatement" in "real" Hebrew.

'Flood of foreign words' in Hebrew

In "lower" Hebrew, the influence of English is even more pronounced. The Bezak telephone company's new "pre-paid service" plan for long-distance calling is called "sherut pre-paid." Shopping malls in Israel are filled with stores that appear to believe that an English name spelled (or misspelled) in Hebrew characters over the entrance of the store will provide a certain cachet (and attract more customers).

Yet anyone who knows the history of languages will not be surprised or troubled by this flood of foreign words into modern Hebrew. Hebrew has readily accepted foreign words many times in its history, not just in the days when it was mostly a literary language. Even the spoken Hebrew of the classical rabbis (whose devotion to Hebrew and Jewish values cannot be doubted) was full of thousands of words of foreign origin. From itstadion (stadium) to istenis (an overly delicate person, related to the word "esthete"), from polmos (fight or conflict, related to the word "polemic") to bulmos (a strong desire to eat, related to the word "bulimia"), from ikonin (likeness, related to the word "icon") to epikoros (Epicurean, and hence any heretic), the classical rabbis absorbed Greek words and, without even taking them for a fast dip at the mikvah, considered these words to be kosher Hebrew and used them, without shame, in Jewish religious texts.

Many of these words have fine, "pure" Hebrew equivalents. The rabbis, for some reason, preferred to use the Greek words. I assume that the choice was not really a conscious one, just like the choice of a modern Israeli author who uses effectivi or understatement.

Even the Committee for the Advancement of the Hebrew Language in Israel today is commonly known as the Akademia, a fine Greek word. Is the use of the word Akademia for a Hebrew-language committee any more troubling than the fact that the classical rabbis gave a Greek name to the highest Jewish court of justice, the Sanhedrin?

Consider the text in the Babylonian Talmud (Sotah 49a): "During the polmos of Titus [the Titus war], the rabbis made a decree against Greek wisdom." Surely the rabbis could have found a word in "pure" Hebrew to describe the tensions and battles between Jews and Romans in the days of Titus! Ironically, with all their dread of assimilation, the rabbis used, in a text that describes anti-Greek measures, an unnecessary Greek loan word. They were not averse to "borrowing" thousands of Greek words and Judaizing them. It is hard, then, to fault modern Israelis who do the same with English words.

Could we even consider adopting the position of Eliezer Ben Yehuda, the pioneering fighter for Hebrew purity? In his mammoth 16-volume dictionary of Hebrew (roughly the equivalent of the large Oxford English Dictionary), Ben Yehuda refused to include any word that he considered "impure" Hebrew. Of the six old loan words listed above (in the fourth last paragraph), only one of them, for some reason, made the cut into his dictionary: epikoros. The fact that Jews have been using words like istenis and holmos in holy and secular literature for 2,000 years did not move him. For Ben Yehuda, pedigree was more important than usage. But it's hard to justify an approach like that. Proud "Hebrew speakers in their own land," as Maimonides wrote, have been borrowing non-Hebrew words since biblical times. Why stop now?

Leaders should promote Hebrew as unifying value

What should really concern us about Hebrew today is not the impurities that creep into it in Israel, but what is happening to Hebrew in the Diaspora, and particularly in the English-speaking Diaspora. With our factionalized Jewish community, our leaders ought to be promoting Hebrew as a unifying value, as something "Jewish" that can bring religious and secular Jews together. Instead, Hebrew is on the decline in North America.

The number of day schools committed to ivrit be'ivrit (using Hebrew as the language of instruction for the Hebrew and Jewish studies curriculum) has dropped significantly. Not surprisingly, day school graduates' ability to speak and write Hebrew has plummeted. Friends who teach at the Rothberg School for Overseas Students at the Hebrew University in Jerusalem tell me that not too many years ago the average day school graduate from North America ended up in level dalet (4) of the Hebrew University ulpan system. Today it's level bet (2) on average. (We do better in Canada than in the United States, but only marginally.)

Diasporah Hebrew a concern

At the Jewish high school I attended in Toronto (class of 1969), it would have been unthinkable for me ever to address a Hebrew or Judaica teacher in any language other than Hebrew, even if we met on the street, or even if we met, as we once did, at the Festival Theatre in Stratford, about to see a Shakespearean tragedy. A number of my high school Judaica teachers spoke English better than they spoke Hebrew. But it was understood that Jews talk to their teachers in Hebrew, in class and out of it. Not everyone who attended my high school was a genius, but everyone who graduated was fluent in Hebrew.

Today there is no longer any Jewish high school in Toronto where all the Judaica teachers are capable of conversing in Hebrew. The culture in the day schools is such that even the few students who are fluent in Hebrew (from spending a sabbatical in Israel or for other reasons) would never think of speaking Hebrew to their teachers, even their Israeli teachers, outside of class. Even inside class, more often than not, the teachers who try to teach ivrit be'ivrit have no expectation that a student will answer in Hebrew, and every year fewer and fewer teachers make the effort to teach with that method. Even shlichim (teachers who come temporarily from Israel to teach Judaica in the Diaspora) teach in English at times.

The situation outside of Toronto is generally much worse. Again, my contacts in the ulpan program at Hebrew University have informed me of the results of their research into the state of Hebrew teaching in North American high schools. They tell me that many schools in America call themselves

Hebrew could be shared by all Jews

ivrit be'ivrit schools, but only because they have totally changed the meaning of the phrase. If the text of the Bible is read by the students in Hebrew, the school calls itself ivrit be'ivrit, even if all discussion of the text, both by students and by the teacher, is in English.

To me, the saddest part of the story is that even Israelis have given up on the idea that Hebrew can be taught to Diaspora Jews. At many of the Zionist yeshivot in Israel, even the ones where the philosophy of Rabbi Kook reigns supreme, programs have been established where students who graduate from a day school high school in North America can study high-level Judaica for a year in Jerusalem or its environs, and never learn any Hebrew to speak of. The Gemarah teachers and the philosophy teachers are often native English speakers. Even the most elite of these institutions, the ones that accept only the most brilliant students, feel no need to make Hebrew part of their educational philosophy for their Diaspora students.

I have heard all the explanations about why we can't teach Hebrew today the way it was taught 30 years ago. I am not convinced by them. The result for the Jews of the Diaspora, I believe, is very sad. The Hebrew language (and the culture that goes with it) is something that could be a shared value for every Jew – Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, Reconstructionist or secular-Humanist. All of us in our fractious community could become fanatical about the same Jewish value: the centrality of the Hebrew language. Yet almost none of us do. Unfortunately, we tend to get fanatical about things that divide the Jewish community, not things that could unite us.

As English conquers the world more and more in the Internet age, promoting the Hebrew language is, I know, a hard sell. But it can be done. At York University we still have at least three courses every year (not counting language-acquisition courses) that are taught ivrit be'ivrit, where the professor teaches Jewish texts in Hebrew, and the students answer in Hebrew and write papers and exams in Hebrew. It is not time to throw in the towel. The revival of Hebrew in the 20th century was one of the greatest Jewish accomplishments. Let us resolve to build on that accomplishment and to strengthen it in the 21st.

Hebrew: a linguistic study

By RAPHAEL NIR

In the Hebrew year 5750 (1989-90), Israel marked the centennial of the founding of the Committee for the Hebrew Language, thus affording a suitable opportunity to review the development of Hebrew during the past century and to reflect on what can be expected of it in the future. Many people consider the revival of Hebrew as a spoken language after an interval of 1,700 years a miraculous process, a kind of wonder, for linguistic development generally moves in the opposite direction: over time, a language which was first used only for speech develops into a literary language, a vehicle for written communication. Though detailed research has not yet been carried out on the revival of Hebrew in every one of its stages and aspects, it does appear that the time is now ripe for an interim summary. The rapid changes of modern life and the dynamic development of communications raise with greater urgency the question of the future of the ancient system of communication which serves us here in Israel: the Hebrew language.

Futurology always entails speculation. The future, unlike the past, cannot be documented, and so it is relatively easy to "describe" it without having one's "facts" challenged. While alternative scenarios may be proposed, each of these must be anchored in a given point of departure, for the present is a direct outcome of the past. Linguistic futurology, like every other type of futurology, thus entails extrapolation from the present situation.

In indulging in linguistic futurology, one also courts the danger of wishful thinking. In order to be free of the temptation of seeing what one's heart desires, it is best to begin from a well-founded descriptive viewpoint. Such an approach does demand a special effort, however, when it involves a phenomenon as dear to us as the future of the Hebrew language.

Language is a decidedly social phenomenon. Like all social phenomena, language develops in response to social forces, whether they come from "below" or "above." The development of a language is the outcome of internal processes within a society and, to a lesser degree, of directives from the responsible official bodies. This is the state of Hebrew today. At the beginning of the period of revival, directives from the Committee for the Hebrew Language, from the educational system and from the Hebrew newspapers published by Eliezer Ben Yehuda predominated. The influence of the Committee for the Hebrew Language and its successor, the Academy of the Hebrew Language, continued later as well, but over the years, the development of the language gathered a momentum of its own, and most of the changes in it during the past two generations derive from processes coming from "below." Thus it seems that efforts to predict the state of Hebrew in the 21st century should be based mainly on the power of popular factors. Our basic assumption is that the role of official bodies such as the educational system and the Academy of the Hebrew Language will have a relatively limited influence on the development of the language.

There is no fear for the survival of contemporary Hebrew anymore. During the past century, the Hebrew language has demonstrated its great vitality and its ability to serve Israeli society in every sphere of life. Can we conclude from this that the Hebrew spoken in Israel in 2050, for example, will be precisely the language of today? That is very doubtful. All languages change constantly, and in a society as dynamic as our own, even more so. Nevertheless, it is clear that forces of changes are not equal in every area of the language. For example, vocabulary and semantics generally change at a faster rate than grammar.

Most rapid change takes place in popular speech

The most rapid change in the development of any language takes place in popular speech. One must therefore assume that a chance conversation between a contemporary Israeli speaker of Hebrew and his counterpart of 2050 would involve certain communication difficulties. The differences between the speakers would not be found specifically in the accent, but mainly in the way the words were divided in the flow of speech, in the pitch, in the hesitation, and in other para-verbal sounds that accompany speech. As noted, changes in language generally affect vocabulary; this applies equally to formal and "intermediate" speech, and to popular speech. By a cautious estimate, approximately 40 percent of the verbal structures used in contemporary Hebrew were created during the past century. With regard to the roots of the words, innovations were fewer and, according to the Even-Shoshan dictionary, they account for about 10 percent of all the roots found in Hebrew.

A new music is heard now in Israel.

It can be presumed that significant changes in vocabulary will also take place in the coming 50 years. It is likely, however, that the rate of change will decline to some degree, for the urgent need to invent words for daily use that was felt at the beginning of the period of revival is less acute today.

With regard to changes in vocabulary, an increase in the influence of foreign languages can be expected, especially that of English, because of close ties with American culture. It is well known that cultural influence brings linguistic influence in its wake (for example, the influence of Arabic on medieval Hebrew). Israeli society is open and pluralistic, and can be expected to remain so. Hence it will be difficult to halt the linguistic influence of the West. English has a special status in this respect, both because of its cultural influence and also because it has become the international language of communication.

The influence on vocabulary is found both in the direct borrowing of words and also in the borrowing of meanings in loan-translations. According to Even-Shoshan, the proportion of verbal structures borrowed from foreign languages since the Haskalah (Enlightenment) period accounts for 10 percent of the entire vocabulary. That depends, of course, on the definition of a "loan word." Generally, foreign words are not included in this category if they are limited to narrow technical or scientific usage. Similarly, it does not include words borrowed by Hebrew from other languages with which it had contact during the biblical and mishnaic periods, since these words are generally not considered "foreign." Many earlier borrowed words, which were once used by Hebrew speakers, have been replaced by more modern Hebrew words. For example, in the 1950s, the word teksi (from taxi) was replaced by monit, and helikopter was replaced by masok. Nevertheless, many new loan words, such as video, digital and salami, have penetrated our speech. This process of the penetration of "international" words is typical of all western languages which are open to inter-cultural contacts. There is no reason to expect Hebrew to be different.

'Direct borrowing of words'

Influences on vocabulary are not, of course, limited to the direct borrowing of words from foreign languages. Together with them can be mentioned loan-translations and reference-translations. A loan-translation is the creation of a new Hebrew word or expression by means of the literal translation of each of the components of a parallel foreign expression. In such cases, the foreign influence is expressed in the imitation of a foreign structure, either through the idiomatic combination of words or by the creation of a new word (generally a noun or verb) patterned on the foreign word. An example is the expression ish-kash, which is the literal translation of the English idiom, "straw man." The influence of this expression has actually gone beyond its use in English, since what an American might call a "dummy corporation" is called a chevrat-kash (literally, a "straw company") in Hebrew. Another example is the phrase laruts lebechirot, a literal translation of the English, "to run for election," depending on a metaphorical extension of the verb "to run."

Another loan-translation involving the creation of a new verb based on an English parallel is lechayeg (to dial). This is taken from components already existing in Hebrew vocabulary or grammar. The innovation does not, therefore, derive from the import of a new word from a foreign language, but rather from the new use of an existing Hebrew form based on imitation of a foreign linguistic form, even though the influence of such cases is hidden because of the use of Hebraic linguistic materials.

In the case of reference-translations, we have the semantic influence of a word or phrase in a foreign language which does not result in the formation of a new expression. New content is given to an existing word, taken from its parallel in a foreign language. For example, the word aruts (channel) has taken on the English meaning of a television channel as well. Similarly, the word kochav (star) also refers to a famous figure in entertainment or sport because of its use in that sense in English. The degree to which this phenomenon is already widespread is an indication that it will become even more so in the future. It allows us to preserve the external form of Hebrew vocabulary, while at the same time adapting it to modern concepts.

It should be noted that many of the semantic changes that have taken place in Hebrew do not result from any parallel influence from foreign words. Such semantic shifts are typical of all living languages. Sometimes additional meanings are added to words and occasionally the new meaning entirely drives out the earlier one. An example is the modern Hebrew word hitnachlut, which derives from the verb lehitachel, meaning to settle (on the soil of the Land of Israel). Originally this word referred to the biblical settlement of the Land of Canaan by the Twelve Tribes. Since the Six Day War of 1967, the words have come to refer to Jewish settlement in Judea, Samaria and the Gaza area. Although this is a clear deviation from the original meaning, in contemporary Hebrew, these words are used only in their new meaning. Another example is the noun masa, which meant "movement between distant places" in biblical Hebrew. In contemporary Hebrew it has come to mean an organized trip, generally for youth, and later, also, a campaign, as in masa bechirot (election campaign) or masa pirsomet (advertising campaign).

The word mivtsa was coined during the 1948 War of Independence to indicate a military operation. Meanwhile it has taken on a new meaning of a sale at reduced prices, so that it is now used in phrases such as mechirei mivtsa (sale prices). It seems that modern society has a constant need for new terms to indicate various phenomena. When it does not coin a new word, it changes the meaning of an existing one, using it for the new concept. This social need will probably intensify.

There is a need to coin new terms

In some cases, the need to draw a distinction between similar concepts gives rise to the need for coining new terms or for changing the meaning of existing words. The noun hatkafa, for example, comes from medieval Hebrew, where it meant "attack." In order to distinguish between various kinds of attack, two new words were coined, both deriving from the same root. The first is hetkef, meaning a sudden illness (that is, hetkef lev — heart attack), and the second is mitkafa, a military offensive. The original hatkafa now mainly refers to an aggressive show of opposition to a person or institution, as in politics.

Creation of new words important activity

Another instance of this kind of change regards the word mahapecha, a general word for "revolution." In time, two new words have come into wide use, both based on the same root. The first is haficha, which originally referred to the action of reversal, but which is used in modern Hebrew to mean the violent overthrow of a government – coup d'état. The second word, mahapach, originally referred to one of the cantillation marks in the Bible, but now it refers specifically to a surprising political reversal which, for example, took place as a result of the 1977 elections when the Likud political party succeeded in defeating the long-ruling Labour party.

Other examples of the process of drawing distinctions are: bitachon (security) and betichut (safety); mechabel (terrorist) and chablan (sapper); havchana (distinction) and avchana (diagnosis); halik (procedure) and tahalich (process); savlanut (patience) and sovlanut (tolerance); ishur (confirmation) ishrur (written confirmation); chakira (investigation), mechkar (research), tichkur (briefing), and tachkir (interrogation). The latter four nouns derive from only two verbs: lachkor, which can mean to investigate or to do research; and letachker, which can mean either to brief or to interrogate. In order to emphasize the semantic differences between the nouns, they are used with auxiliary verbs, that is, one "carries out" an investigation, "engages in" research, "arranges" a briefing, "undertakes" an inquest.

Along with semantic changes that have taken place in ancient words, the creation of new words is a very important activity, in which the process of the adjustment of Hebrew to modern reality is paramount. Since the revival of spoken Hebrew, the language has proven its ability to create new words to fit its needs, using linguistic material which already exists. Most of the innovations have been made in the classic way: that is, by approaching unused forms which can be made from a given root. For example: tasrit (scenario) was taken from the same root as seret (ribbon, or film); tashlil (photographic negative) was taken from the root sh-l-l, (negating); migzar (sector) was taken from the same root as logzor (to cut); tikshoret (communication) comes from the same root, as kesher (connection); the root of parit (item) is the same as that of prat (detail) and tafrit (menu). Yeri (shooting) was taken from the root y-r-h, which appears in a very ancient passage of the Bible, the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15:1), meaning "to throw," as well as later in the Bible, meaning "to shoot" (arrows).

Regular means of coining words in Europe

Nevertheless there are signs of a transition away from this matrix-structured word-coining in which the basic element is a Hebrew root, to a linear type of word-coining where the basic element is the vocabulary element itself. This method is without doubt the regular means of coining words in European languages. In Hebrew it takes the form of the addition of prefixes and suffixes to the basic word, or the combination of several basic words to create a new element.

The addition of prefixes creates words such as du-leumi (bi-national); al-yesodi (above-primary – that is, secondary, as in secondary education); al-cheled (non-rusting). Words such as yetsuan (exporter), chalalit (spaceship), and mekomon (local newspaper) demonstrate the addition of suffixes to a basic word, here being -an, -it and -on respectively.

Examples of the combination of two words are rakevel (funicular, a vehicle), from rechev (travelling) and kabel (on a cable); mankal (director general), from menahel (to direct, manage) and klali (general); and ramzor (traffic light), from remez (signal) and or (light). The linear coining of words is particularly notable in the creation of brand names for products, where it has almost completely replaced matrix-structured word-coining, so that we have: al-tush, a mosquito repellent (from al, which means "no," and tush, which comes from yatush, "mosquito"); or pladelet, a brand of steel (plada) door (delet).

The future of Hebrew writing

We may assume that this means of coining words will take an increasingly prominent place in the future, mainly in the popular formation of words. Words coined by adding elements to a base are usually transparent. In general, though not always, the new words retain the entire base, and the prefix or suffix alter their meaning. Nevertheless, the coining of words in the traditional fashion will doubtless continue, mainly through the committees of the Hebrew Language Academy.

With regard to verbs, there is a tendency to create new ones based on a secondary four-letter root (that is, a grammatical form not existing in the sources), a tendency which strengthens the semantic distinctions among verbs. Thus in addition to standard verb forms in the usual structures such as lehachzik (to hold), lehadlik (to light), lerakez (to concentrate), or lechashev (to calculate), we have new parallel formations such as letachzek (to maintain), letadlek (to refuel), lemarkez (to centralize), lemachshev (to computerize), and lechashben (to make a reckoning). In most of these instances, the four-letter root is taken from a noun, and one of the most common noun-forms for coining new words from old roots is the tafel form, as in tachker (to inquire, see above), taktsev (to budget), tazmer (to orchestrate), tazmen (to co-ordinate), tafel (to operate) and targel (to exercise).

This tendency opens up many possibilities for varying meanings and enriching the semantic system of the Hebrew verb. Even though certain sticklers for grammatical detail are uncomfortable with these forms, it seems that in the future we can continue to expect the creation of secondary verbs.

We now turn from vocabulary and semantics to grammar, the system of forms. This system is generally characterized by a great degree of stability and is not subject to rapid changes. Nevertheless, in this area, too, we note a certain tendency which, one assumes, will increase in the future: the tendency to avoid irregular forms and thus to increase grammatical uniformity. For example, despite the grammatical rules of pronunciation, Israelis commonly say shAmartem (you watched) rather than shEmartem; yashAn (he slept) instead of yashEn; etchem (to you) rather than otchem; hA-chamor (the donkey) and not hE-chamor; and vE-chachamim (and the wise), rather than vA-chachamim.

It seems that one should include in this tendency to simplify the grammatical system the increasing tendency to ignore the distinction between the genders when using primary numbers. This distinction is difficult for speakers, and it could become more blurred in the future. It may be that in time, the numbers will be used only in their feminine form, because it is shorter and simpler. Such a change will probably first take place in speech (popular and then formal), and then gradually penetrate the written language. It is true, however, that tolerance for change in grammar is much lower than tolerance for change in vocabulary, and therefore grammatical changes will doubtless encounter strong opposition on the part of the rule-makers in the educational system and academies.

The Hebrew system of writing without vowels also contributes to the tendency to simplify the grammar, because it only partially reflects morpho-phonemic changes. In the system of writing used today, the difference between etchem and otchem is apparent, but not the differences between yashan and yashen or shemartem and shamartem or the alternate pronunciation of the definite article (hA- or hE-). In this way, the standard writing system provides a kind of legitimization for the tendency to regularize patterns – that is, for the gradual ignoring of irregular forms in declensions, conjugations, prepositions and the pronunciation of the auxiliary letters.

This brings us to the broader issue of the future of Hebrew writing: will the form of writing now prevalent also retain its form in the future? It is commonly assumed that the writing system is a permanent fixture of a language. Of course, changes have been documented in the development of languages, both in spelling and in writing, though in general, writing systems reflect some pronunciations which are no longer current. This is because pronunciation is subject to rapid change, whereas orthography tends to be conservative. In modern Hebrew, two systems of writing are used: vocalized writing and unvocalized writing. This is, indeed, the official state of affairs. However, in fact, various systems are in common public use. Sometimes it is difficult to find consistency in writing, even within the same newspaper article.

Over the years, numerous and even strange proposals have been put forward for the reform of Hebrew writing, beginning with the addition of letters for the vowel sounds "a" and "e" and some going so far as to propose the use of the Latin alphabet. (Various proposals for changing the writing system are documented by Werner Weinberg in The Reform of Hebrew Writing [Hebrew, Magnes Press, Jerusalem, 1972]. The purpose of these proposals was to decrease the number of homographs (words spelled the same way but pronounced differently) and also to simplify the process of learning Hebrew. It should be emphasized that every effort to reform the writing system has ended in failure. The main reason for this lies in the desire to preserve the ancient Hebrew writing system intact (or at least not to harm it.)

In predicting the future, one should distinguish between changes in spelling and in writing. It is difficult to imagine that drastic alterations will take place in the latter. There seems no chance of changing over to the Latin alphabet, both because of emotional opposition among the Hebrew-speaking public and also because that alphabet does not suit Hebrew's morpho-phonemic structure. Nevertheless, it is possible that minor changes will take place in spelling. One may assume that in the future, a non-vocalized spelling system will take shape, one which will be "fuller" than the conventional vocalized spelling but not to the same degree as stipulated by the Hebrew Language Academy.

Finally, let us consider a socio-linguistic development typical of any living and spoken language: the emergence of distinctions among dialects and pitch. Sociologists commonly assume that members of a society adapt the language they speak to their needs of communication. Indeed, over time in every society, linguistic registers develop which serve varied needs. Some authorities regard these registers as a kind of "sub-language," the use of which is dictated by environmental considerations, such as the intended audience, the degree of formality, the medium (speech or writing), and so on.

Linguistic pluralism is recognized and accepted

Nor may one ignore typical characteristics of the language spoken within certain social groups. Among groups which form by themselves, generally unconsciously in Israel, certain forms of expression may be particular to politicians, academics, school children, soldiers, talmudic students, people with little formal education, members of kibbutzim and others. Linguistic pluralism is a recognized and accepted phenomenon in an open society. Israeli society is markedly heterogenous, and therefore one may assume that stylistic distinctions in the use of the Hebrew language will not diminish in the future, but, on the contrary, will increase. One may hope that distinctions in registers and dialects will not make communication more difficult among the various groups in Israeli society.

Looking back, one may say with satisfaction that, during the century of the revival of Hebrew as a spoken language, it has shown surprising adaptability in coping with the challenges of the modern world. Hebrew as spoken in Israel is used effectively in all forms of personal and mass communications: the economy, the army, science, education, commerce, sport and all other spheres. We may also note the emergence of several typical styles, such as that used to report the news in the press and in the electronic media, and in legal contracts. The developments which have taken place in the language strengthen its power of expression and its ability to distinguish between fine shades of meaning.

Worldwide phenomenon

In the future as well, the Hebrew language will certainly continue to change and develop. As noted, a significant portion of these changes will take place under the influence of foreign languages, especially English. This influence will be expressed not only in the borrowing of words, but also in the borrowing of meanings and in imitating the linear method of word-formation. Yet one should not assume that this trend poses any danger to Hebrew's basic Semitic structure.

Purists who are worried about possible developments can perhaps find consolation in the fact that the penetration of foreign languages is a worldwide phenomenon. This is apparently what will continue to happen as the world increasingly becomes a single global village whose parts are interconnected by a highly developed system of communications and transportation. Israel, a small country with an open society, cannot isolate itself from the influence of western culture. One may not assume that intervention on the part of institutions seeking to preserve the "purity" of the language will manage to ward off these influences – at most it might be possible to moderate them.

Yiddish then and now: the when, who and why of mamaloshen

By LEO DAVIDS

We know that Jewish life in Europe goes back to Roman times, since Jewish representatives had to deal with the Roman government even before the destruction of the Second Temple in Jerusalem. After the Roman triumph in Judea, Jews began to settle in many parts of the Mediterranean, including the seacoast, which later became the southern limit of France; along the east coast of Spain; and throughout central Italy.

From this original area of European settlement, Jewish pioneers began to move northward, through northern Italy and river valleys such as the Rhone and the Garonne. By the early Middle Ages, there were Jewish settlements along the Danube and the Rhine, as well as in the south of the Iberian Peninsula and the west coast of the Mediterranean (regions known as Cataluña and Provence). Jewish literacy in the Dark Ages stood out as the successful survivor of an ancient civilization after the Roman Empire had disintegrated completely. At that time, there was little hostility facing Jews, and the Jewish communities in Europe prospered.

Eventually, however, troubles began. Attacks, and later, expulsions became common when the Crusades began to change the whole tone and thrust of European public life. History shows that Jews had become unwelcome throughout most of central and western Europe toward the end of the medieval period. (Look at the maps in Martin Gilbert's Jewish History Atlas to see what happened.) All Jews were expelled from England and Wales in 1290, from the northern parts of France in 1306, from large parts of Germany in 1348 and from Hungary in 1349. The following century continued the same trend, as Jews had to leave Austria in 1421, and massive expulsions in 1492 removed visible Jewish life from Spain, Sicily and Sardinia. They took with them their faith and traditions, some personal belongings, and the language mixture they had been developing in those centuries. That language mixture, which we shall describe a little further on, is what we today call Yiddish.

Where could the expelled Jews go? They found havens in North Africa, Poland and Russia; throughout the Ottoman Empire; and in Italy. Small numbers remained in western Europe, not far from the older areas of settlement, finding new homes in what later became Belgium and Holland. Yet the great mass of Jews settled in the Slavic areas of eastern Europe: Poland, Ukraine, western Russia, and up into Lithuania and Latvia. In these areas, the predominant languages were not the ones that the refugees had been speaking previously. Now they had to choose between giving up their previous linguistic habits and expanding their language repertoire to become trilingual. Becoming trilingual would mean knowing their ancestral tongue, Hebrew; continuing to speak the important urban and commercial language of that time, German; and picking up the local vernacular to be able to communicate with their new neighbours, whether in Polish, Russian, Lithuanian or another language. They chose to become trilinugual rather than give up the Gutenberg-era German they had come with. But why did they go this route?

One might say that this is the language choice a group makes for socioeconomic reasons. Those who spoke German in that era, five or six centuries ago, were understood to be urban, literate and modern. On the other hand, those who spoke the local tongues were viewed as poor and ignorant country folk. So, given a choice about the image or status that they could claim, they would no doubt prefer to speak the language that gave higher prestige and more opportunity, rather than to adopt only the local languages. As things turned out, Jews for the most part kept on speaking the German language that they had brought to eastern Europe, but combined it with their own familiar Hebrew terms and a small number of words borrowed from the languages spoken around them in the new areas.

And so Yudish-Deutsch (Judeo-German), or Yiddish, was born. The linguistic makeup of Yiddish was and remains about 15 to 20 percent, Hebrew; 75 to 80 percent, late medieval German; the remainder (less than 10 percent), a small number of words from Polish, etc. (American and Canadian Yiddish speakers throw in some English, and nobody finds that strange!)

'Yiddish did quite well in early 1900s'

Although Jews spoke to each other in Yiddish on a day-to-day basis, they obviously continued to study and make some use of Hebrew, especially in religious practice. There were many such Jews in those faith-filled centuries, which is why a considerable Hebrew element remained part of Jewish German. One other thing to remember: this language was written, then as today, in the Hebrew letters, which practically every Jew was familiar with from early childhood. So, spoken Yiddish remained understandable for anyone who spoke German, but the written language was only accessible to those who knew the Hebrew alphabet.

Skipping over a few centuries, substantial emigration from eastern Europe began in the mid- to late 1800s. This is not the place to describe or explain the massive shift of Jewish population to the New World, but it is a well-known fact that millions of Jews settled in the United States, Canada, Argentina and other countries in North and South America. Obviously, their familiar mamaloshen (mother tongue) crossed the ocean together with them, and so Yiddish became a normal feature of the urban landscape in Montreal, Baltimore, Chicago, Toronto and every large city in the eastern areas of the United States and Canada.

Yiddish did quite well throughout the early 1900s, being the common language for millions of Jews, not only in North America, but throughout most of the Jewish world. Yet the Holocaust had a devastating impact on Jewish life, and especially so in regard to Yiddish. The heartland of the Yiddish-speaking population was destroyed, and a million Yiddish-speaking children were annihilated. Now, Yiddish would either survive in other areas of the world, or it would follow its murdered devotees to a sorrowful grave.

What has happened since the 1940s, that is, since the destruction of the "shtetl" world, its culture and its own language? Where is Yiddish spoken nowadays, and by whom? Instead of attempting a worldwide reply to these questions, let's paint a Canadian picture. The Canadian side of this story is told by figures on which language is reported as first childhood language (that is, mother tongue) on the census. The table above right highlights the main trend; let's look at the statistics.

We can see that Yiddish was the standard mother tongue among Canadian Jews in 1931, but afterward, the percentage of Yiddish mother tongue declined because the second and third generation of Canadian Jews grew up with English as their home language and as the very powerful language that they used at school and on the streets.

In 1951, the majority of Jews still reported Yiddish as their mother tongue, and younger Jews had a passive command of Yiddish; although they didn't speak it very often,

Daily use of Yiddish decreased in '60s, '70s

they understood it fully and had no problem receiving communication from older Jews who would speak to their children and grandchildren in Yiddish. At the same time (in the 1950s and later), home use of Yiddish was increasingly mixed with English, and therefore the mother tongue of Canadian Jews who grew up shortly after World War II would have combined English and Yiddish in most cases. (This went on everywhere that Yiddish was spoken.)

During the 1960s and '70s, the daily use of Yiddish among Canadian Jews decreased rapidly. Whereas in 1951 the Yiddish mother tongue population in Canada amounted to 51 percent of all those reporting the Jewish religion, by 1961, it was only 32 percent as large as the total number of those reported as being of the Jewish denomination. This figure indicates that, in the decades after World War II, English was replacing Yiddish as the predominant language at home for Jews.

Nevertheless, the Yiddish language was still commonly used among those who themselves were of Yiddish mother tongue, so that most who had been brought up with it were still speaking it in their homes. This had become an option one chose rather than an environmental given, as it been for the first-generation immigrants in earlier decades. And although those who were not of Yiddish mother tongue were obviously not going to be using Yiddish at home, at that time (around 1960) there was still some considerable supplementary schooling in Yiddish among secular, usually socialist circles.

Speaking other tongues

Meanwhile, many were speaking other tongues. A growing number of Jewish day school students were learning Hebrew (Ivrit). We should not forget, either, the thousands of North African Jews who settled in Canada after 1956; none of them came here with Yiddish, which was unknown in that area. They spoke French, Spanish or Judeo-Arabic, and have their own linguistic-cultural concerns.

By the 1970s, Yiddish was no longer a language in general use among Canadian Jews. According to the 1971 census, the total Yiddish mother tongue population in the country was below 50,000; yet Jews (by religion) numbered 276,000 in that year. So, the table shows that the Yiddish count was only 18 percent of the Jewish population – four out of five children had grown up with English or another language as their first tongue rather than Yiddish.

By the 1970s and subsequently, the secular Yiddish schools in Canada were not enrolling any significant number of students, nor was the transmission of Yiddish at home and in the community doing very well. By 1971, there was really no Yiddish mother tongue population left in the Maritime provinces, though Toronto, Winnipeg and Montreal still had large groups of Yiddish mother tongue and small groups of Yiddish home language. The language's evolution has continued in the same direction since then, with growing numbers of Hebrew students but less Yiddish use/study. Today, every student in a Jewish school studies some kind of Hebrew (be it biblical or modern), but only a minority learn Yiddish.

When available, home language data – better statistics on language retention since today's home language is the next generation's mother tongue – provides us with the big picture. In the 1980s, the home language question was added to Canada's census.

At that time, by 1981, the ratio between those of Yiddish home language and the Jewish population had become really small. In that year, the single-response Yiddish home language population of Canada amounted to under four percent of those reported as being of the Jewish religion.

Majority not transmitting Yiddish

Furthermore, the 1981 census indicated that the majority of Yiddish mother tongue respondents were no longer reporting Yiddish home language; these were people who had been raised with Yiddish as children, but were not speaking the language at home and therefore not transmitting it to their children.

Now, let's examine the census information of 1991 and 1996. By this time, Yiddish home language had practically died out in Canada's Jewish population, with Yiddish essentially disappearing from the lips (if not the heart) of all those other than the two small groups who still used it at home: senior citizens and the haredi community. The latest data, in 1996, show that the continued growth of Hebrew was surpassing the use of Yiddish on some measures, but not yet in regard to the total mother tongue count, where Yiddish retained its large carry-forward of seniors who still reported that mother tongue on the census.

Based on the able-to-converse criterion, then, we see that Hebrew has become more of a normal Jewish language than Yiddish at present. In 1996, more than 60,000 people across Canada were able to converse in Hebrew (of which a few must have been Palestinian Arabs), versus a total population of 46,650 able to converse in Yiddish, which shows Yiddish as a little over 75 percent as large as Hebrew on this measure.

Comparing the two tongues with regard to home language, we find them very close, since Yiddish and Hebrew each had a home language population in 1996 of about 8,000. Interestingly, the number of Yiddish at-home speakers had not changed its total at all between 1991 and 1996. (Although many Anglophone Jews have left Montreal in the past few decades, Yiddish speakers are more likely to stay there.) This suggests that Yiddish home language has stabilized at this 8,000 level, as the strong haredi home language group is at the moment able to fill in for the constantly decreasing number of non-chassidic Yiddish home language seniors, who are being lost in the natural course of events. In the coming years, we would expect this figure to remain fairly stable, as the Montreal haredi population continues to grow and use Yiddish.

Comparing Yiddish and Hebrew for Montreal and Toronto, we find that Greater Montreal is today the sole stronghold of Yiddish home language, while Greater Toronto is Canada's centre for Hebrew home language. More Montrealers can converse in Yiddish than in Hebrew, but that difference is fairly small: there are 21,170 Montrealers who report that they know the Yiddish language, versus 19,325 Montrealers who can converse in Hebrew. (Many of these are the same individuals, speaking both tongues.) The gap for Toronto is much larger, and runs in the other direction: 30,400 Torontonians reported they were able to converse in Hebrew in 1996, versus 18,475 who are able to speak Yiddish.

Furthermore, when one compares the two cities with regard to home language, we find that the differences are in a similar direction. Hebrew was used as a home language (in 1996) by 1,940 Montrealers, whereas Yiddish is the home language for 4,765 of them. However, only 1,600 Torontonians are reported as of Yiddish home language, versus 4,250 who regularly speak Hebrew at home.

Yiddish, then, is no longer a recent immigrant language, but has about half of its current speakers born in this country. (Most Canadian Jews are well-integrated into the larger society, and have little need to speak anything other than English, except for those in the Montreal area, who use some French.) These speakers are either older Jews or haredi – especially Montreal's chassidic children, living in dense, yet culturally isolated communities – with smaller and much weaker pockets of Yiddish language in Toronto and, formerly, Winnipeg. The future of Yiddish in Canada is being carried by these haredi children and no one else.

Hebrew, however, is a growing language in Canada because it is fed both by significant net immigration from Israel and by a strong Jewish educational system in Canada's big cities, which serves both Israeli and non-Israeli students. Jewish education means not just the Hebrew language taught at school, but often a year in Israel either right after the completion of high school or sometimes during the university years.

So as Yiddish holds on in Montreal (and in similar strong Jewish centres in other countries), Hebrew continues to grow by yeridah (emigration from Israel) and in Jewish day schools, where it is studied for religious or Zionist-nationalistic reasons. Toronto, in particular, is a major centre for Hebrew culture and education, and will no doubt stay so in the near future. And as both languages continue in the future to be part of Canada's linguistic mosaic, Hebrew will continue as the numerically predominant Jewish language, in this new century.

Reflections on Ladino

By SAM BENSION MAIMON

This article is adapted from passages in The Beauty of Sephardic Life by Sam Bension Maimon, a compilation of Maimon's articles written between 1971 and 1982 for La Boz (The Voice), the monthly newsletter of the Sephardic Bikur Holim Congregation in Seattle, Wash. Reprinted with permission.

At the beginning, the word "Ladino" was used to signify the translation of any Hebrew word into our Judeo-Spanish idiom. This we can say from our own personal experience. During our school days in Turkey, anytime we wanted to translate a Hebrew word to our own idiom, we used to say, este byervo se Ladina este modo (this word is translated in this manner), or el Ladino de ervo es esto y esto (the translation of this word is such and such), again, only to indicate the meaning of that certain word.

Incidentally, we used to run across a lot of words that we didn't understand, because the Bible translators, and our instructors after them, continued to render some words in the same archaic Judeo-Spanish. Our generation had already adopted substitute words for them, be they of Turkish, Hebrew or Greek origin, that were employed by the Sephardim in daily use.

As we said, the original intent of the word Ladino was meant to be used as translation, until it changed so much that it would serve us well to explain the history and the evolution of this term.

Most historians agree that our Sephardic ancestors were brought to Spain by the Romans as captives and exiles from the land of Israel. Of course, these exiled Jews used Hebrew as their everyday language, which was their native tongue. However, years later, when Hebrew ceased being their means of communication, our rabbis, by necessity, had our Bible translated into Latin, which was the local language during that period. (These early Sephardim, besides Hebrew, spoke Latin also.)

Later on in history, a good chunk of southern Spain was conquered by the Moors, whose language was Arabic. All our illustrious Sephardic sages who lived in this region, like Rabbi Yehuda Halevi; Rambam, who was born in Cordoba; and many others, spoke and wrote most of their works in Arabic.

Then, when the Spaniards reconquered this part of Spain from the Moors, the language of the whole country became Spanish. It was at this period that our rabbis, again, had to retranslate the Bible and some prayers from Hebrew into the Spanish language to accommodate the Sephardim who were not conversant with Hebrew. This latter translation was called Barbaro Latino, or as some pronounced it, Lathino. Eventually this translation came to be known as the Ladino translation.

In the Hallel prayer, which we also recite the night of Pesach in the Haggadah, we say: Bezeth Yisrael mimisrayim, Beth Yaacov me'am lo'ez, and when we read the Haggadah in Ladino, this verse we translate: en salir Yisrael de ayifto, caza de Yaacov de puevlo ladinador. In short, we translate the Hebrew word lo'ez to mean, as the Radak (Rabbi David Kimchi) has it in his Bible commentary, "any alien language other than Hebrew." And so the Sephardim continued to refer to Ladino as a "foreign language," which to them meant Judeo-Spanish.

Another term was also used to mean Judeo-Spanish, and that was Judesmo. But Judesmo was used mostly to mean the spoken language rather than the written one.

Did our Sephardic ancestors use Ladino before the expulsion in 1492? I would say yes, because of a statement we find in the writings of the famous Sephardic haham, Rabbi Yitzhak Bar Shesheth. Rabbi Yitzhak was the rabbi of Barcelona in the late 1300s, who later was forced to run away from Spain and settle in North Africa. This, mind you, was 100 years before the expulsion of 1492.

Anyhow, being that Rabbi Yitzhak was recognized as a great scholar and a respected authority, he used to receive a tremendous amount of inquiries from Spain on questions of marriage, divorce and the like. In answer to one of his rabbinical colleagues, he records the fact that one of these inquiries came to him from Spain asking him to resolve a certain question, and that this particular letter was written in Judeo-Spanish or in Ladino.

There are two famous Bible translations into Ladino: one dating back to 1547, printed in Constantinople, and the other to 1553 in the city of Ferrara, Italy. The first one used Hebrew characters and the Ferrara Bible used Latin characters.

Ladino has undergone many changes from the Spanish

Ladino, as we Sephardim use it today, underwent many changes from its original Castilian Spanish. To many Spanish words we added a letter, as mucho became muncho. With many other Spanish words we shed a letter, as hermano became ermano. In the course of time, our Levantine Sephardim snuck in many non-Spanish words, like Hebrew, Turkish, etc.

Now I would like to examine two purely Ladino words that no one but a Sephardi would recognize, because they cannot be found in a Spanish dictionary.

Alhad. We Sephardim use Spanish words to indicate the days of the week except the one used for Sunday. Instead of the Spanish word Domingo, we use Alhad, an Arabic word meaning "first" or "one," therefore, "the first day of the week." The reason for this substitution is that the word Domingo stands for the day of their Christian deity. As is well understood, our ancestors would never use such a word.

Hadras. This word is also pure Ladino, and cannot be found in any Spanish dictionary. It is derived from the Hebrew, and has a rather interesting story. We read in Kings II, Chapter 4, that when Elisha the prophet had occasion to visit the city of Shunem, a man and his wife went to all kinds of trouble to furnish him with a place to stay, and managed to have it there permanently for when he visited that town. So Elisha asked them why they were going to so much pain and trouble for him. The word Elisha used to ask why they were bothering so much was harada. In time, this word took the meaning of "Why all the hullabaloo?" Later they added another word and made it into a phrase, "hadras y baranas," meaning a person is making a lot of show-off noises. We also refer to a man who's putting on a lot of empty airs as hadrozo.

In a letter printed in the February 1976 issue of the Sephardic Home News of New York, the sender, who chose to remain anonymous, was astonished to discover that the word "Ladino," found in all Spanish dictionaries, is defined as "cunning," "crafty," "treacherous" and other such meanings. And so he asked, through this letter, some expert to "delve into the truth of this dilemma."

All this was pointed out to him when he introduced himself to some Spanish American citizens as a Sephardi-Ladino.

First of all, to say that a person is a Sephardi-Ladino is incorrect. He can say he's a Sephardi who speaks Ladino. We Sephardim use the word Ladino to indicate the language we use, but not to indicate our ethnic group.

As to this letter writer's surprise, he couldn't be more shocked than some of us were when we first heard the term "Jew you down" to mean haggle, to dicker or to drive a bargain. You would expect in an enlightened country like the United States this wouldn't happen, but it did.

I will leave it to expert Spanish language scholars to go back in history and trace back the derivation and etymology of the word "Ladino" and why the dictionary defines it the way it does. But I suspect the same way that some bigots here in our country defined the word "Jew" in a derogatory manner is the same way "Ladino" was defined by some Spanish Jew-haters with an insulting connotation.

The term indicates a language, not an ethnic group

Then again, we have in the English language certain words that are now defined by a different meaning than the original meaning. For instance, take the word "doctors." Certainly medicine is an honourable and respectable profession, and yet we find people use "to doctor" to mean "to tamper and to change."

Then there's the harmless little word "book." When used as a verb "to book" means "to charge a person with a crime," especially at a police station. There are countless such words, that started out harmless enough, but popularly evolved into ominous definitions.

It was a delightful sight to see the youth conduct all the religious services in our synagogue on Simchat Torah. The president of the day stressed the need for our youth to learn and perpetuate our Ladino language and our heritage. A very good idea!

In line with this trend, it would be apropos to try to understand and trace back some of the Ladino expressions employed in our daily conversations.

At this time, let's take the Ladino saying, letras de vatodienu. This saying is meant to indicate the following: "I have explained the matter to you in unmistakable terms." Or, as we say in modern slang, "loud and clear."

The origin of this expression can be better understood by explaining that the Hebrew word vatodienu is the first word of a special prayer that we recite on any Jewish festival that occurs on Saturday night. This prayer is printed in our old-style festival books in large letters, the reason being that before the discovery of electricity, when synagogues were lit by candlelight, the people were not able to read the small print in the book until the shamash had a chance to light up those scores of candles.

Using Ladino sayings; understanding their explanations

In connection with this, we may mention the custom in our synagogue that the hazan reads aloud the middle portion of the Amidah of the evening services on Shabbat or festivals. According to traditional ruling, the audience is supposed to say the entire Amidah in silent devotion. Our rabbis, however, eased this ruling, by having the hazan read aloud the portion which is read after the first three benedictions have been read by the congregation silently. The hazan stops before the last three benedictions. It seems logical to assume that this custom evolved from the time that all the members did not have prayer books.

There is one exception to this rule, and that is on the eve of Yom Kippur, the reason being that the synagogue was lit up from early evening and it was pretty certain that all the congregants had their own private prayer books.

Continuing with Ladino expressions, we will present two more with their explanations.

First, al shefoh se sienten las bozes. Loosely translated it means, "We'll see what happens at the end." During the heat of a given argument, one person argues, another shouts, and another one rants and rambles on and on. A detached bystander can philosophize and say, "We'll see what happens at the end of this argument." The Hebrew word shefoh is the first word or the beginning of that portion of the Pesach Haggadah that we recite after the meal, when quite a few are already either sleepy or feeling the effects of two or three cups of wine, or a little hoarse from shouting the first portion of the Haggadah with the initial enthusiasm, so that only those who survive the lively ceremony can really be heard. So this saying evolved in our Sephardic vocabulary to mean: Wait and see what happens at the end.

Second, ke darshe mi ijo ke seya en Tisha b'Av. This saying, literally translated, means: "I hope my son will make a speech even if it's on the fast of the ninth day of Av." Loosely translated, it's used mostly to mean: Let my son improve his ways even if it takes a little more time than usual.

There is a rather cute story to illustrate this point. Once there was a lady whose son was studying at the academy. He was a brilliant student, except for one thing. When it came time to deliver a sermon, he became extremely shy. The mother, anxious to hear her son make a speech, went to the teacher, asking him to find a way to cure her son from his terrible shyness. The teacher said, "There is one way. On the night of Tisha b'Av, when it is customary to put out the lights in the synagogue, I'll have your son deliver a sermon. Thus he can overcome his stage fright." The mother replied, "It's okay; ke darshe mi ijo ke seya en Tisha b'Av."

The Spanish refran, a popular poem

In the book of the same name, Don Quixote tells his servant Sancho: "Pareseme, Sancho, que no ay refran, que no seya verdadero." According to experts in this particular field of Spanish literature, the word refran, meaning proverb or popular saying, is found in early books only after the middle of the 15th century. These experts advance the idea that, originally, this Spanish word refran was used to indicate the repetition of the last few lines of some popular poem or a popular song, very much the same as we, today, use the English word "refrain." Later on, refran was applied specifically to mean a popular saying.

We Turkish Sephardim know and employ refranes in three languages – Hebrew, Ladino and Turkish: Hebrew, because there are countless refranes in the Bible, like Mishle and Koheleth (Proverbs and Ecclesiastes), added to the thousands that are found in our Talmud and Midrash; Spanish or Ladino, because our forefathers brought them from Spain and they are still used by us; Turkish, as a natural result, as our people lived in Turkey for many centuries.

It's really amazing to see how many books, articles and other types of publications have been written on the subject of refran Sepharadi alone. Besides Rosanes, Galante, Kayserling, Danon and many others who have compiled hundreds of these refranes, there are a number of Sephardim living in Israel now who are collecting all these refranes so that this unique branch of our Sephardic culture will not be lost to our future generations. Many times, a refran is used to illustrate a point, or to clarify an otherwise obscure subject.

Following are a few Sephardic refranes, with English translations. I'm quite aware that some of our members know these already, perhaps better than I, but these are strictly for our interested youngsters, who want to know the origin and some stories that are connected with them.

Esta en sus treje. He's standing on his Thirteen. (This saying goes back to the days of the Spanish Inquisition, when the priests tried to have some Jews change their religion, and they failed in their efforts. Then these priests would utter this saying, Esta en sus treje, meaning these Jews insisted and wouldn't budge from their belief in the Thirteen Fundamental Principles of Judaism.)

Kedo kon la tinya y la Turkedad. He got stuck with the scalp disease, and his conversion to the Turkish religion. There was once a poor Jew who contracted a scalp disease called tinya in Ladino. After trying everything under the sun to cure this tinya, and not being successful, he was advised to go to a Turkish hoja (priest), recognized as an expert in curing tinya. So this poor Jew, out of desperation, came to the hoja's house, who told him, "If you want to get cured, you have to become a Turk, and convert from Judaism to being a Mohammedan." This prove Judio (poor Jew) agreed. Unfortunately, after many treatments, the tinya was still as thick as ever. Hence the saying "Kedo kon la tinya y la Turkedad." Not only did it not help his ailment, on top of that he got stuck with the Turkedad, his unwanted conversion to the Turkish religion.

Lamed holem lo! The Hebrew letter lamed joined with the Hebrew vowel holem, spelled lo, meaning, "No!" It was applied in the following manner, for example: David is about to purchase a valuable item from a non-Jewish merchant. A friend, Haim, who is with him at the shop, understands the quality and value better than David, and Haim wants to indicate to David not to pay the price, but doesn't want the shopkeeper to sense that he's trying to spoil the deal. So, Haim starts singing, "Lamed holem lo" as a subtle hint to David, "No! Don't buy it," therefore saving David a bundle.

Este es nasido de viernes. He's born on Friday. There was a popular belief that a person who happened to be born on Friday was mysteriously gifted with an extraordinary talent to outsmart any of his friends, having the faculty of a sharp and intelligent human being. So, you have to be careful in dealing with such a smarty.

Este aroz areyeva muncha agua. This rice will require a lot of water to cook properly. As if to say: in a situation which at first appeared so simple to resolve, it gradually develops so that it gets more complicated than was anticipated. Therefore, it will take more time to wind it up. It may need the intervention of other individuals and the employment of additional funds in order to bring it to a satisfactory solution.

Ladino greetings and sayings

Trokar kazal, trokar mazal. Move to another town, your luck may improve. As if to say: in case you fail to accomplish a certain venture, or you're not able to make ends meet by the usual methods, change your tactics (or location) and you may hit it lucky and accomplish your goal.

Bar minan. Aramaic: Let it be far from us! When someone mentions an accident, an injury or a mishap, or any other tragic event that happened to someone, we say: Bar minan! "I hope it never happens to us or to any of our family and friends." It's a sort of prayer to God to keep us safe and away from similar mishaps.

Bivas! May you live long. There's an old tradition that says there was a time in old antiquity that when a person sneezed, that one sneeze caused his death immediately. Finally, one of the patriarchs pleaded with God to abolish this type of death caused by a sneeze. Since then, the custom of saying bivas to a person who sneezed started meaning, "Rather than death through this sneeze, we wish you long life." Our custom of saying bivas to a baby who sneezes continues if the baby keeps sneezing: on the second one we say crescas (may you grow), on the third we say te engrandescass (same), on the fourth we say para bien (may it be for good), on the fifth we say amen. If the baby continues to sneeze, you make up your own blessings.

Golor de kemado, la barva de tu kunyado. Something smells burning, it's your brother-in-law's beard. An example as to when we use this expression is as follows: In a room full of people, one person starts sniffing and says something is burning. As the rest of those present in the room do not smell anything burning, automatically they address this one person, "You know what you are smelling that is burning? It's your brother-in-law's beard." This indicates that it's all in this person's imagination.

Mijor pan seco con amor y non gayina con dolor. Rather eat dry, old bread with love than eat chicken, accompanied with pain. This expression is used when a person would rather do away with all the luxuries in the world, preferring a simple, harmonious life, even though he sees others have all things that money can buy. These affluent people are constantly arguing, depriving themselves of the affection that goes to make a happy enjoyable life.

Inche cuvos, echa a la mar. Fill up buckets of water and empty them right back into the sea. This expression can be illustrated by a person who is trying very hard to convey an idea to another or to a crowd, but he uses arguments that are neither logical nor reasonable. His efforts are wasted on the listeners because he repeats his unconvincing approach without adding any new reasons. So because his efforts are falling on deaf ears, he is likened to a person who fills up his buckets with water, but turns around and spills all the water in the bucket right back to the ocean, because, despite all his efforts, the problem is far from being resolved.

Cuando ay un metalik solo en la cumbara, aze mucho ruido y barana. When there's only one dime inside the piggy bank, it sure makes a hell of a lot of noise.

I'll let the readers use their imagination, and write their own commentary on this last refran.

Some of the members of our community have indicated to me that they're very much interested in learning the proper Ladino greetings for different occasions, as well as the proper reply. So, once again, I have to say to those of our readers who are familiar with these greetings that they are here for the benefit of our younger readers who are interested in the preservation of our Ladino culture.

On inquiring about a friend's health – Greeting: Ke tal estas? (How are you?) or Ke mos kontas? (What's new?) If everything is okay – Response: Bendicho el Dio or Gracias a Dio. (Thank God.) If things are not all that well – Response: Diremos bueno, ke mos se aga todo bueno. (Let's say well so everything will be well.) Arogar al Dio salud buena. (Ask God for good health.)

When offering condolences to a person or family who lost a dear one – Greeting: Vozosh ke bivash. (You who are left shall live.) Some add, mos embaraso' muy muncho. (We were very sorry.) Response: Just a nod with head bowed. On the last day of mourning – Greeting: El ke tenga repozo bueno-y mas por dingunos no. (He shall have a good rest and this shall never happen to anyone else.) Response: A nod of the head. Some greet the remaining mourners, Los ke vos kedaron ke vos bivan. (The ones that are left shall live.)

It used to be a very beautiful custom among Sephardim that when a friend dropped in for a visit, the hostess would offer the guest a cup of Turkish coffee on a beautiful tavla (tray) filled with various types of dulce (sweets). Sometimes it was dulce de conja (a jelly made from rose petals) or dulce de cayissi (apricot compote) or dulce de bimbriyo (quince) or naranja (orange marmalade or other citrus fruits) all personally prepared by the lady of the house. Before the guest would eat this delicious treat or drink the coffee, he would offer his good wishes – Greeting: Dulces alegres (sweets). Some would add the Turkish word dovletlis (wish you all the best). Response: Dulces siempre. (May it always be sweet.)

Dulces alegres;
Dulces siempre

When friends wish to offer congratulations to the parents of a bar mitzvah boy – Greeting: Novyo ke lo veamos. (We hope to see him grow to be a bridegroom.) Some add, Con padre y madre y todos justos. (With father and mother and none missing.) Response: Y lo veremos todos con salud buena. (And we shall see them with good health.)

On meeting a friend who is celebrating a birthday or a wedding anniversary – Greeting: Munchos y buenos. (Many good ones.) Response: Y agas. (You, too.) Some add, con salud buena. (With good health.)

On seeing a healthy increase in members of a family or some other additions, Puyados y no amenguados. (You shall multiply and not subtract.)

There are many, many more, but this will suffice for now.

Shalom, beraha vetova! (Peace, blessing

The creation of Esperanto

By FRANK NUESSEL

The story of Lazar Ludwig Zamenhof begins with his birth on Dec. 15, 1859, in the town of Bialystok in what is now Poland. At that time, the city formed part of Lithuania in an area with diverse ethnic (Russians, Poles, Germans, and Jews), linguistic (French, German, Russian, Polish, and Yiddish), and religious (Jewish, Orthodox, Catholic, Protestant) groups. Zamenhof, his parents (Marcus and Rosalie) and his eight siblings (Sara, Fania, Augusta, Felix, Henry, Leon, Alexander and Ida) were keenly aware of the prevailing anti-Semitism. At an early age, Zamenhof, the eldest of his siblings, endured taunts and physical abuse.

Regularly witnessing such prejudice and discrimination, Zamenhof grew up to believe that the single most important cause of racial, religious and ethnic hatred was a lack of communication due to literal misunderstandings. He would ultimately seek a way, through language, to address that hatred and to ameliorate those communication problems. His multilingual background – he knew many different classical and modern languages including Yiddish, Hebrew, Polish, Russian, French, English, Lithuanian, Latin and Greek – would provide him with an extensive basis of grammar and vocabulary upon which to develop an entirely new language. In 1878, at the age of 19, he wrote an initial draft of his international auxiliary language; he developed a second version in 1881.

In 1887, Zamenhof married Klara Zilbernik. In that same year, with the 10,000-ruble dowry he received, he published the first edition of his language in Russian, called An International Language: Introduction and Complete Manual. The author of this volume was listed as Dr. Esperanto (one who hopes) because Zamenhof did not want it to interfere with his own professional life (he was a practising oculist, or in today's term, ophthalmologist) nor cause possible embarrassment to his siblings. His pseudonym soon became the name of the language itself, though he had intended to label it Lingvo Internacia (international language).

In his treatise, Zamenhof specified three factors that would make his language successful: (1) it must be very easy to learn; (2) it must be possible to use the language immediately for international communication; and (3) it must be capable of overcoming the indifference of the world by inducing the masses to use it as a living language. In particular, he envisioned a universal language that would bring people together and foster harmony as opposed to other, existing languages that contained ethnic and historical baggage and derogatory terms.

In that vein, Zamenhof proposed a concept called Homaranismo (the promotion of the ideals of humanity). Homaranismo, originally called Hillelism, appeared in a publication with that title in 1901. Zamenhof changed the name from Hillelism because it had a religious reference; he wanted his concept, in addition to his language, to be secular as well as neutral. He later referred to this concept as the "inner idea," signifying the humanitarian ideals and goals he believed in.

As Esperanto became more well known, it was perceived by some as a threat. Adolf Hitler had a personal vendetta against the Zamenhof family, not only because they were Jewish, but because of Zamenhof's creation.

Zamenhof's children died in Holocaust

Hitler specifically mentioned Esperanto as a threat to Germany in his now-infamous treatise of hate. In fact, the use of the language was forbidden in the country. Many advocates of Esperanto were singled out for persecution and many of its adherents exterminated. Hitler, it should be noted, was not the only despot to exterminate Esperantists. Joseph Stalin, from 1937 until his death in 1953, systematically executed thousands.

It's ironic that in the face of Zamenhof's comitment to Esperanto and its peaceful ideals, all three of the Zamenhof children – Adam, Sofia and Lydia, who obtained a law degree but dedicated her life to the promotion of her father's language – would die in the Holocaust. A German Gestapo chief in Warsaw received personal orders from Berlin to imprison the family. Adam was shot to death in a mass execution in Palmiry, Poland, in January 1940. In August 1942, Wanda, Adam's wife, their son Ludwig (Zamenhof's grandson) and Sofia were arrested in the Warsaw Ghetto and taken to a train station for transport to Treblinka. While Wanda and Ludwig managed to escape, later immigrating to the United States, Sofia and Lydia were transported to Treblinka. Wanda died in an automobile accident in Warsaw in 1954. Ludwig, the only one in the family who lived a full life, became an engineer and an active Esperantist.

Since its inception, a culture has surrounded Esperanto and Esperantists. The colour green, universally recognized as meaning hope and regeneration, and a five-pointed star first appeared on early French editions of Esperanto materials. Other symbolic elements include the singing of the hymn La Vojo at the beginning of meetings, and the display of a green flag with the aforementioned star. Every year, with the exception of those during the two world wars (1916-1919; 1940-1946), there has been an annual world Esperanto congress. The first took place in Boulogne, France in 1905; this year's conference was in Zagreb, Croatia from July 21 to 28. Words in Esperanto and pictures of Zamenhof have been printed on the official postage stamps of many nations including Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Bulgaria, Cuba, Hungary, Poland, Russia, Suriname, Switzerland, The People's Republic of China, and the former Yugoslavia. And Zamenhof's bust has appeared on coinage in Cuba and Poland.

Esperanto possesses a substantial literature. In addition to translations of literary classics such as Shakespeare's Hamlet (by Zamenhof himself) and numerous translations of other literary masterpieces, including Pushkin's The Snowstorm, Dante's Divine Comedy, Goethe's Faust and Sophocles' Oedipus Rex, there is also an important body of original creative literature written in Esperanto. In fact, it is possible to speak of three distinct periods of Esperanto literature.

The first period (1887-1918) was one of experimentation and promotion, with the publication of books dedicated to increasing Esperanto's popularity, translations, including Zamenhof's translations, and original work, including Zamehof's original poetry. The second period was during the inter-war years (1920-1939). One well-known Esperanto writer at this time was France's Raymond Schwartz (1894-1973) who wrote numerous novels and poetry, including Verdikata Testamento (Green Cat Testimony), published in 1926, and Prozo Ridetanta (Smiling Prose), published in 1928. Schwartz had a literary prize named after him; in 1980, it was awarded to Eva Tófalvi and Oldrich Knichal for Kiuj Semas Plorante… ('Those who sow with tears…') about World War II.

The third period dates from the end of World War II and is best represented by poetic works. Julius Balbin, professor emeritus of Essex Community College in New Jersey, has written several collections, including Imperio de l'Koroj (Empire of the Hearts), published in 1989, which feature some heart-rending poems about his experiences as a survivor of Hitler's notorious death camps.

Esperanto is the only one of approximately 1,000 planned languages that has ever met with unqualified success. Today, its speakers have been estimated to number between 120,000 and two million worldwide. Its practicality lies in its simplicity: there are only 16 rules of grammar. Research shows that individuals who have studied Esperanto will be more successful learning additional languages. From a sociological point of view, Esperanto has a norm-oriented dimension – that is, there is an emphasis on the language's practical uses for trade, conferences, travel and so forth. More recently, there has been support for its value as the sole language for air-traffic control in place of English since its vocabulary draws upon so many other languages.

A short stanza from one of Zamenhof's best known poems entitled La Espero (Hope), and, considered by many to be the anthem of the Esperanto movement, provides a good example of the language.

En la mondon venis nova sento,
Tra la mondo iras forta voko;
Per flugiloj de facila vento
Nun de loko flugu gi al loko.

In the world has come a new feeling,
Through the world there goes a strong call;
By means of wings on a light wind
Let it fly now from place to place.

Zamenhof died on April 14, 1917, of heart failure. He would be pleased to know that his creation continues to be used in the 21st century, reflecting his idealism and hope for a peaceful world.

How the 'rain in Spain' fell in Eretz Yisrael

By DAN ALMAGOR

Certain dates in the history of the Hebrew theatre in Israel can be termed milestones. Most are linked with the founding of new theatrical groups or the dedication of new halls. But something rather different from all such serious dates occurred some 33 years ago, in February 1964. It had to do, in fact, with the lighter side of the theatre: the premiere of a large-scale musical of the kind staged on Broadway or in the West End of London. This was the Hebrew-language production of My Fair Lady at the national theatre, Habimah.

Whoever had the good fortune to be present at that festive event, which took place in the presence of the prime minister of Israel, Levi Eshkol, and other members of the government, recalls the prevailing atmosphere of a historic occasion. The Israeli version of the world-famous musical replicated the Broadway staging: the director, the choreographer and the set designer were all brought over from New York. But the very fact that it was possible to see in Hebrew such a spectacular Broadway show, with more than 100 actors, singers and dancers performing against the background of gorgeous sets, which had also been seen in the great theatres of New York and London, filled the Israeli spectator with special excitement.

Added to the pioneer feeling on the part of all the participants in the production was the fact that, for at least two of the central figures, the show truly had the nature of a first attempt. Despite the premiere being staged at the national theatre, this was not a production by Habimah or by any other repertory theatre. (The Habimah stage happened to be free only because the company had left to participate in a festival overseas.) My Fair Lady was produced by Giora Godik, an independent impressario who brought to Israel a number of foreign artists and troupes. Still, Godik had never before produced in the theatre, and certainly not on such a scale.

Even more striking was the fact that the female star, Rivka Raz, playing the part of Eliza Doolittle, was not a well-known actress at all. The sum of her stage experience prior to My Fair Lady had been a small singing role in a cabaret staged a few months previously in a tiny basement on Tel Aviv's Ben-Yehuda Street. She had played opposite two veteran comedians, Shai K. Ophir and Shimon Israeli; the cabaret was entitled Shin-Shin, from the first names of the two male actors, which both began with the Hebrew letter shin. It was the good luck of the 22-year-old Rivka – who had grown up in a Jerusalem neighbourhood, the daughter of a Sephardi family, and had served as a lieutenant in the Israeli army – that a musical skit about 20 minutes long had been included in that satirical cabaret. The skit concerned a sensational British scandal of the time, a political and erotic triangle whose three sides were the British defence minister, John Profumo, the Soviet military attaché in London and the famous call girl, Christine Keeler.

How did this tabloid affair become linked with My Fair Lady?

How did this tabloid affair become linked with My Fair Lady? Israelis privileged to see the show in London or New York during those years came home with excited tales of the new musical whose songs were frequently broadcast on the radio. Also familiar to the Israeli audience was the plot of George Bernard Shaw's Pygmalion, the play from which Lerner and Loewe adapted their musical, and which had been given a successful production in Tel Aviv a decade earlier. When I wrote the material for that satiric cabaret I allowed myself to use three characters from the play: Henry Higgins, Colonel Pickering and the flower-seller Eliza Doolittle, who became the models for the characters of Profumo, the Soviet colonel and Christine Keeler. I included in the satirical framework some of the songs from the musical, to which I gave Hebrew rhymes recalling the London scandal. The audience laughed, and Godik, who happened to be present at one of the basement performances, decided on the strength of the unknown young girl's performance in that skit, that he had at last found his Hebrew Eliza Doolittle and could go on to realize his longstanding dream: to stage My Fair Lady in Hebrew. And on the strength of that parody, I was privileged to be invited to translate the splendid musical into Hebrew.

Play based on ancient Greek legend of Pygmalion

But at this point the problems began. The play and the musical are based on the ancient Greek legend of the sculptor Pygmalion, who fell in love with a statue he had made of a girl, Galatea, and tried to breathe life into her stone image. In the modern version, as is well-known, the sculptor is transformed into an expert phonetician, Prof. Henry Higgins, who makes a wager with another phonetician, Col. Pickering, his guest from British India. Higgins bets Pickering that within a short time, he can succeed in changing a simple flower-seller with a common manner of speaking into a lady who can effortlessly navigate her way through London society. Higgins not only boasts that he can identify every dialect and accent in the British sub-species of the English language (not to mention the entire universe), but he also maintains that he can recognize every geographical point where a given speaker of English has ever sojourned in his life. He can perform this feat by analyzing the speaker's vocabulary, and even more to the point, by the way he pronounces his words.

We have, in other words, a play dealing with language – living, spoken language, rich in dialects and manners of pronunciation. Each such pronunciation is linked with a point on the globe and a particular educational history. Higgins can immediately detect whether the coachman, the charwoman or the flower-seller was born and brought up in one area of London, or another a few streets away. When Eliza Doolittle is dressed in fine clothes suited to a respectable venue like Royal Ascot or Mrs. Higgins' drawing room, she may suddenly surprise the listener with a vulgar word or phrase that gives everyone gooseflesh and suggests low breeding.

How on earth to translate all this into Hebrew? As we hear in Prof. Higgins' song, Why Can't the English..., ours is a strange, even terrifying language: "The Hebrews learn it backwards, which is absolutely frightening!"

True, Hebrew is rich in slang, dialects and allegorical nuance, as befits one of the world's oldest tongues. In contemporary spoken Hebrew and Israeli slang we can even point to many words and expressions borrowed from English. Nevertheless, most Israeli slang derived from three other languages which were not especially familiar in Covent Garden or Lissom Grove, and certainly not at the time of Shaw and Higgins: Yiddish, Russian and Arabic. However, a Russian colonel appeared in the parody of My Fair Lady, and in the vicinity of Lissom Grove today, one will find more Arab restaurants than pubs or fish-and-chip shops. But who would find it believable to hear Alfred Doolittle or his daughter Eliza speaking in the rich, colourful idiom of a Jerusalem taxi driver?

Hebrew is rich in slang

Moreover, in many larger countries it is indeed possible to pinpoint a person's origins and abode from listening to his speech. Every area has its characteristic pronunciation and vocabulary. But in a compact land like Israel, where one can go in about an hour to an hour and a half from Tel Aviv to Beersheva in the south, Jerusalem in the east, or Haifa in the north, and where there are no isolated villages lost somewhere in the mountains or the desert, how could one find Hebrew equivalents for the styles of speech of the various characters in the play?

Of course there are clear distinctions between the dialects of Hebrew speakers who come from Yemen or Russia, Morocco or Romania, Iraq or Bulgaria, Iran, Poland or the United States. Certainly there is no call for the talents and expertise of Prof. Zóltan Karpathy, the Hungarian expert in phonetics and pupil of Henry Higgins (the "ruder pest from Budapest"), to outline the Hungarian origins of Hebrew speakers who have been living in Israel for decades. Speakers of Arabic may reveal themselves as Egyptian or Syrian, and certain Bedouin tribes exhibit linguistic characteristics of their own. However, profound differences in pronunciation among Hebrew speakers in different areas of Israel scarcely exist – especially not since the levelling effect of radio and television.

It is true that in biblical times there were distinctions of pronunciation of the Hebrew language among some of the tribes. The sons of Ephraim (Judges 12:6) paid dearly for the special way they had of pronouncing the letter shin in the word shibboleth. (How would they have pronounced the title of the show Shin-Shin? – as Sinsin?) Even on the cusp of the 20th century, some teachers of Hebrew in the old-established Galilee villages tried to instil in their pupils a distinctive pronunciation, different from that in other regions of the country. They asked them to pronounce the letter bet, even when it was soft and sounded as a v, as if it were a b. Thus their pupils were made to say the word zebubim, instead of the accepted pronounciation zevuvim (flies). This artificial and esoteric experiment did not last long. However, even today one can pick out a native of Jerusalem owing to his way of pronouncing a word such as matayim (two hundred): the veteran Jerusalemite will say me'atayim. Elderly residents of Rehovot, scarcely 20 minutes distance from Tel Aviv, can also be identified: not only because they use a number of Hebrew words exclusive to Rehovot, introduced by Hebrew teachers at the beginning of the century – such as local coinage, dupia, a hose for watering the garden, composed of the words du (two) and pia (the "mouth" of the hose) – but also because of the way they say the plural of ticket for theatre or bus. The citizen of Rehovot will say kartsim instead of kartissim, the linguistically correct version. Taken all together, though, such words are very scarce and could not have been of any help in translating My Fair Lady.

Locales can determine accents

For the sake of scholarly accuracy we must admit the existence of an area in which even today linguistic differences can be traced among the various settlements in Israel. This has to do with children's games and slang expressions related to them. Certain terms and ways of pronouncing them differ from town to town, and children have been using them for 100 years at least. So, for example, some children use the ancient and correct Hebrew word gulot when they refer to the game of marbles. Elsewhere, children are accustomed to use the word julot, and in other localities, balorot. Various types of coloured marbles have various names in various places. One, rassiya, is derived from the Arabic raissiyye. This is the finest and most expensive, the chief and emperor of marbles. We hear the influence of the Arabic rassiye, derived from ras, cognate to Hebrew rosh (head) – or perhaps that of French words, recalling the last decades of the previous century when that language was spoken in some of the early settlements (for example, gazoza, a marble with air bubbles trapped inside it, in the spirit of the carbonated soda, gazoz, Israel's most popular drink until Coca Cola arrived and elbowed it out of everyday speech). Or shever ha'even, a game in which children draw squares on the ground, keeping one foot steady while moving from square to square with the other. In one town this game is called even (stone), in another shaish (marble), and in my childhood home of Rehovot it is called, with exclusivity to that locale, pashta (also the name of one of the Hebrew cantillation marks, but with no relation to it). When children quarrel among themselves, in most parts of Israel they call the child who is being "sent to Coventry" a name related to the word for a dog: kalba or kalabusta (kelev – dog), or – in an Arabic derivation – tchilba. In Rehovot alone, for generations now, there is another pejorative which has nothing to do with the canine family, and whose origins are shrouded in mystery: darringa. Naturally, there are many more locutions associated with children's games and street songs which have preserved the regional distinctions that gave rise to them. Some originated in amusing corruptions of foreign words, which may even be difficult to identify.

Fair enough: but how many children's games does Eliza Doolittle refer to in the course of the play I was asked to translate?

Israeli audience had no difficulty following plot

Before I began my translation, doubts also arose in the producer's mind: perhaps it would be impossible to represent in Hebrew the divergent styles of speech of London's neighbourhoods. Would the Israeli audience have difficulty following the thread of a plot that depends on those divergences? Would it perhaps be best to adapt the plot to Israeli circumstances, to change the setting from London to Tel Aviv, as our commercial theatre had done with a number of popular comedies?

Hebrew marked by foreign accent

Let us say for argument's sake that a professor of Hebrew at the university in Jerusalem falls in love with a Yemenite flower-seller. The suggestion was rejected at once. First of all, we knew that the author's agents would never license such an adaptation. Second, the play was already known to the Israeli audience, primarily through the songs broadcast on the radio. And since it had been prepared to accept the parody based on these songs, it would view such a change as barbaric in the extreme.

The third reason was the success of the play Pygmalion, which years previously had proved that the Israeli audience not only experienced no difficulty following Shaw's plot, but even enjoyed it. And fourth – the most amusing reason of all, and possibly the most Israel-specific one – a Yeminite flower girl, if one could find one, would speak Hebrew with an authentic Sephardi accent, closer to the way King Solomon and the prophets pronounced the words of the Bible than most university professors of Hebrew, who migrated to Israel from eastern or central Europe. Their Hebrew is marked with a foreign accent that can be so extreme as to grate on the ear. In other words, if we had copied the play's plot along Israeli lines and set it in Rehovot, Tel Aviv or Jerusalem, Eliza the flower-seller could have taught the professor with the heavy German or Russian accent how to speak proper Hebrew – and not the reverse! And so we rejected that possibility out of hand.

Still, the problem remained: how to put into the mouths of London characters the various Hebrew styles and modes of expression that would distinguish them one from the other, as the play demands? What sort of slang to use when we could not use living Hebrew slang, most of which was derived, as we have seen, from Arabic or Russian?

No need for Israeli-Sephardic slang

The person whose advice I sought in this connection was Prof. Haim Blanc, an expert on nomenclature, who was born in the United States. Blanc arrived in Israel as a young student before the state was established. On the outbreak of the War of Independence in 1948 he was seriously wounded. He was blinded in both eyes and confined to a wheelchair, and remained so for the rest of his life. Nevertheless, he became one of the best-loved instructors at the Hebrew University, as well as an internationally recognized authority on Hebrew dialects.

Blanc's advice surprised me: "Of course there is no need to impose Israeli-Sephardi slang on Eliza Doolittle," he told me. "Try using children's language. Go to kindergartens, listen to the mistakes they make when they speak Hebrew. Then try to put those mistakes in the mouths of the characters when they're talking Cockney. This will create a style of incorrect Hebrew with comical but logical errors. The logic will be that of the speech of children whose native tongue is Hebrew but who make errors in syntax. And when they lack a word, they try to coin one on the basis of words already familiar to them."

A species of 'Hebrew Cockney'

This suggestion by the "Prof. Henry Higgins of Jerusalem" seemed very apt to me. It freed me – and the play's Hebrew version – from any resemblance to slang – the authentic, realistic, common Hebrew of the Israeli street – and provided a graceful, humorous equivalent for the style of most of the play's characters. In fact, my word-coining actor friend, Shraga Friedman, and I (he collaborated with me on translating some of the play's prose passages) together created a new invention. This was a species of "Hebrew Cockney," a new slang which did not quite sound Israeli but was comprehensible to anyone in the audience, especially since some of the London flower-seller's mistakes were known to audience members from their children at home.

After we had discovered this stylistic key, the greatest challenge before us was the Hebrew translation of one of the best-known lines in the show, "The rain in Spain stays mainly in the plain." Following in Shaw's footsteps, the American adapter, Alan Jay Lerner, tried to find a sentence that Higgins could use to teach his pupil to pronounce English correctly. In Eliza's Cockney speech the first words sound like "The rhine in Spine." Shraga and I wondered what might be a Hebrew equivalent for that well-known sentence. We knew that both audience and critics would be waiting to see how we dealt with that crucial line. At first we thought of an equivalent whose every word contained the difficult letter h, which Eliza would pronounce as a soft unaspirated a. It began "Ha'yom yehom ha'yam" – "today the sea shall roar" – words which Eliza would pronounce as Ayom ye'om ayam. But the solution did not satisfy us, especially because it had nothing to do with Spain, and had no connection with the excited flamenco that Higgins, Pickering and Eliza perform the night they return from the ball, where Eliza has managed to fool even the famous Hungarian savant.

And then, as I sat very late one evening in my Jerusalem flat, the telephone rang. On the line I heard my collaborator's rich, familiar tones. "Barad!" (hail) he cried excitedly.

It was midsummer at the time. I glanced out of the window. It could not be denied that 60 kilometres separated Jerusalem from Tel Aviv, but hail? In the middle of August?

"What are you talking about, Shraga? Hail? Where?"

"In Spain!" he replied.

I thought he had gone mad.

But it all came clear after a few seconds. It turned out that Shraga had just come home after acting in a lengthy performance at Habima, and climbed into a hot, almost boiling bath to wash away the day's sweat and refresh himself a bit before he went to sleep. Perhaps the water's excessive heat evoked an association with something cold. Ice. Hail. Suddenly an idea was born: barad, the Hebrew word for hail, rhymes with Sfarad, the word for Spain, which even appears in the Bible. It seems that Archimedes was not the only man who made a discovery while lying in his bath. But unlike Archimedes, Shraga did not dash naked out to the street.

Hebrew My Fair Lady played to packed houses

During that telephone conversation, we came up with another Hebrew word that rhymed with barad and Sfarad: yarad, or "fell." On the spot, we assembled a Hebrew sentence which subsequently became familiar to every person in Israel, Barad yarad bi'drom Sfarad ha'erev (Hail fell this evening in southern Spain). The Hebrew-speaking Eliza at first pronounced the letter r like the guttural Hebrew letter chaf – rather like the letter "j" or "g" in South America (as in the words "José" and "Argentina," or the "ch" in the Scottish "loch." Only after tough, intensive training from Prof. Higgins, who did not refrain from placing in her mouth some glass marbles (or gulot, or julot, or balorot) instead of the pebbles which Demosthenes crammed into his mouth did Eliza succeed in pronouncing correctly the consonant "r."

And only after we had invented our famous Hebrew sentence did I remember that some of the medieval Spanish Hebrew poets used to rhyme Sfarad with yarad – and even with barad (as in a hail of arrows in battle). One of the best-known laments of that era opened with the line, "Aham ki yerad al Sfarad ra min ha'shamayim" (Ah, for evil from the skies fell upon Spain).

After we had cracked the toughest line of all, translating the rest of the play seemed relatively easy. For Eliza's much-loved song, Wouldn't it be Loverly, I found a Hebrew equivalent that was not only a bit of familiar slang but also had the flavour of the original: Yofi li (It's lovely for me). For the translation of the most important word in Alfred Doolittle's song, With a Little Bit of Luck, I of course used the Hebrew word mazal (luck) which is familiar throughout the world through the Jewish blessing Mazal Tov (good luck). Here I added to the word mazal the Hebrew slang expression tip-tipa (since tipa is a drop, then tip-tipa is a tiny little drop). The recurring line in Alfred Doolittle's song thus became tip-tipat mazal (with a tiny drop of luck). Only one problem remained in Doolittle Père's ditty, Get Me to the Church on Time. A church in Tel Aviv? Of course I could have used the Hebrew word chupah, or wedding canopy, but I am not certain that even a liberal thinker with broad intellectual horizions like Mr. Doolittle would willingly accept such a solution. But with a tip-tipa of mazal, the Hebrew word chatunah, or wedding, did the trick.

The Hebrew production of My Fair Lady met with resounding success. To my regret, I was not able to be present on opening night, since I was working on my doctorate at the University of California. But to my surprise, within a fortnight after the premiere I received two greetings from well-known personalities with whom I had never previously exchanged a word. Abba Eban, at that time serving as Israel's foreign minister, came to Los Angeles and sang both of Henry Higgins' songs to the Israeli consul and to me – from memory, without a single mistake, and very much in character. It turned out that he had seen the show twice and confessed he had always harboured a secret wish to play Henry (Higgins, not Kissinger).

The second person to give me greetings from Israel was the commander-in-chief of the Israel air force, who had landed in Los Angeles for several hours, awaiting a change of planes. By chance he was told that I was studying in Los Angeles, and he took the trouble to ring from the airport – even though we had never met before – and tell me what a sensation there had been at the premiere. A typical gesture on the part of Ezer Weizman, who was later president of the State of Israel.

The Hebrew My Fair Lady ran to packed houses for over 500 performances. After Habimah returned from its overseas tour, the producer rented a big old cinema called the Alhambra, in Jaffa. There he continued to mount performances of the show. The Alhambra had been the most elegant venue Arab Jaffa had to offer before the War of Independence. And 900 years earlier, in the city of Granada, where the Alhambra itself stood, a Hebrew poet rhymed for the first time the words barad and Sfarad.

Voices of Jewish Women

By SARA R. HOROWITZ

Al tarbeh siha im ha-isha
Do not speak too much with the woman
(Pirkei Avot, 1:5)

Is there a language of Jewish women? A language distinct from that spoken by Jewish men, and from that spoken by women generally? A language that expresses the experiences and inner lives of Jewish women, one that bears – as languages do – traces of history and culture, embedded over time and usage?

If there is such a language, the Mishnah enjoins its (presumably male) readers not to listen to it. At the same time, the Talmud acknowledges at several junctures that what women say among themselves may be of importance. The rabbis envisioned them gathered together to perform domestic chores such as spinning and weaving, exchanging crucial information as they gossiped in the moonlight.

Of course, although Judaism offers extensive and valuable documentation of what its finest (male) thinkers have written, until modernity, Jewish women have left few written records. This is due partly to disparities in the education of Jewish men and women, and partly to the deep ambivalence regarding the worth of women's words – an ambivalence that continues well into our own era.

Something From Nothing

Several years ago, I heard a distinguished scholar of Chassidism present a portion of his current research to a small group of colleagues at a symposium for professors of Judaica. The professor described an interesting aspect of the observance of festivals among eastern European Chassidim in the 18th and 19th centuries. Giving a spin to the notion of pilgrimage holy days – Pesach, Shavuot and Sukkot – which were observed in biblical times by trekking to Jerusalem, disciples of different chassidic masters would journey to celebrate with their respective rebbes. Thus, he explained, hordes of boys and men would descend upon the normally quiet shtetlach where the rebbes resided, while the women and small children remained at home. What intrigued the scholar was the radical transformations of those shtetlach during festivals – how the towns accommodated this huge influx of men, what provisions were made to house and feed all the disciples for the holy day, how a small shtiebl could hold all those who came to worship with the rebbe.

Curiously, although both men and women professors attended the seminar, during the ensuing question and answer period, only men asked questions. My usually vocal women colleagues remained uncharacteristically silent. It struck me at the time that my male colleagues were fascinated and energized by the world of men depicted in the professor's lecture, but that the women in the room felt somehow excluded from the vision presented in the research. There were, no doubt, some women in those shtetlach – those who lived there the year round, after all, were not required to leave. But they made no appearance in the lecture, save by implication, as invisible hostesses, cooks and servers to the male worshippers. The men in the symposium imagined their way into this past, so vividly described in the lecture, and sought to know more and more details, while the women in the seminar faded into the background, just like their spiritual ancestors.

Moments before the seminar was scheduled to close, I sought to break that dynamic by posing a question to the scholar. What, I asked him, were the women back home doing during the festivals, after all the men had departed to see their rebbes? He answered in a word: "Nothing."

His response took my breath away. Momentarily, I envisioned hundreds upon hundreds of chassidic women in eastern Europe, frozen in place from the moment of their husbands' departure, until their husbands' return, weeks later – like Lot's wife, only reversible. I imagined a futuristic scenario, in which the women were actually cyborgs or androids (gyndroids?) whose husbands flicked the "off" switch when their services were not needed. Alternatively, I fantasized about the secret rituals of eastern European Jewish women, Sabbatian rites, dances in the forests at night, or – suddenly literate – women reading Torah, leading festival liturgy.

'As though the sounds do not exist'

I knew, of course, my fantasies were just that – wild imaginings with no basis in reality. But "nothing?" Surely the women did something while their husbands were gone. What my colleague meant, no doubt, was nothing of interest, at least to him. But I was interested in what occurred in these Jewish communities, suddenly emptied of their menfolk at precisely the time when their presence was ritually important. How did the women observe the festivals? Who said Kiddush, who read Torah, who davened? Who sat at the holy day tables, and at the special meals lovingly prepared to adorn the festival observance? Something, not nothing.

Bats in the Synagogue

The noted Israeli novelist, Amalia Kahana-Carmon, has compared Israeli women's writing to the song of bats in flight. Bats, she explained, navigate by sonar rather than by sight. They emit high-pitched sounds that ricochet through space, creating order and harmony out of what would otherwise be blind chaos. Humans do not hear the song of the bats, she notes, because, although crucial to the life of the bat, these sounds are irrelevant to our own lives. For us, then, it is as though the sounds do not exist; we simply do not register them. Kahana-Carmon sees in our relationship to the bat a metaphor for the plight of Israeli women authors whose words chart the daily existence, sensibilities and metaphysical aspirations of women. Men, she asserts, have not heard these words, because they do not speak directly to and out of their experiences.

'Men have not heard words of women'

Centuries of Jewish experience reinforce this attitude, according to the author. In synagogues, traditionally divided by gender, all of the "action" takes place where the men are: communal prayer, processionals, reading from the Torah. Women, of course, take note of these activities, since they are at the heart of Jewish worship. But "nothing" takes place behind the mechitzah, the dividing boundary between men and women – nothing, at any rate, of ritual importance. So, Kahana-Carmon argues, while women writers generally have to fight to have their voices be taken seriously, the struggle for Hebrew women authors is compounded by the imprint of Jewish tradition.

A good illustration of this phenomenon is the case of Dvora Baron, the first modern Hebrew woman author. Baron began writing Hebrew fiction while still in Europe in the late 1800s, and continued after her immigration to what was then Palestine. A noted writer, editor and critic, Baron was widely published, and highly influential in Israeli letters in her time. Yet early in her adulthood, she closeted herself in her Tel Aviv apartment, and, attended only by her daughter, remained there until her death, several decades later. Her writing fell into obscurity, in part because she chose to write about life in the European shtetls left behind by the Zionists who settled Palestine and created a Hebrew culture, and in part because she chose to write about the daily life of ordinary women.

Baron spelled her last name in the Yiddish rather than the Hebrew manner, with the letter aleph following the bet. Later readers, coming upon her almost forgotten writing, and struck by the power of her language and the depth of her insight, would note the unintended punning created by this spelling, of Baron with ba'aron, in the closet. This play on words encapsulates her life, which she lived out literally as a recluse in the confines of her apartment for several decades, as well as the fate of her writing, metaphorically in the closet, unread and underappreciated until recently.

Double consciousness noted

Double Consciousness in Jewish Writing

What makes for a language, for a literature, that is both Jewish and female? While there is no agreement on what constitutes "Jewish literature" generally – especially if one moves beyond the boundaries of distinctly Jewish tongues, such as Hebrew, Ladino or Yiddish – most readers agree that one or more of the following defines Jewish literature: biblical imagery, grappling with Jewish destiny, ethics, religious life, theology, any aspect of living as a Jew. Some Jewish writing contains untranslated words in Hebrew, Yiddish, or other distinctly Jewish tongues. Sometimes the rhythms of these languages, their cadences, find their way into texts written in English or French or Spanish. A certain kind of self-deprecating humour, too, is often thought of as characteristically Jewish. In Jewish women's writing, in addition to that, one discerns the traces of Jewish women's lives, sensibilities and experiences within the pages of text.

Jewish writing, especially in the Diaspora, frequently exhibits a double consciousness, a term borrowed from African-American writer W.E.B. Dubois, to describe the experience of seeing oneself as though from the outside – in the terms of the dominant culture – and seeing oneself from the inside, in one's own terms. Jewish writing displays a consciousness of the Jewish experience viewed both externally and internally, and of the potential and real conflict between those visions. Different writers lean more toward one or the other aspect, but most embed at least some awareness of this doubleness of vision.

For example, in the film Annie Hall, Woody Allen imagines the way he believes that the parents of his WASP girlfriend perceive him – as a chassidic Jew with earlocks – and this despite the acculturated character he plays, depicted elsewhere in the film cooking lobsters. Philip Roth, especially in his early stories, portrays Jewish rituals and Jewish characters as vulgar, loud, vapid and materially driven. These are not-too-sympathetic representations of Jewish life and culture as seen from the outside. By contrast, Isaac Bashevis Singer portrays his father's court, and Chaim Grade depicts the world of the mussar Yeshiva, in its own terms.

Seeing oneself as though from the outside

In Jewish women's writing, the consciousnesses multiply. Often, women write consciously as Jews (undifferentiated by gender) in a dominant diasporic culture, as Jewish women within the context of women writers more broadly defined, and as Jewish women in a Jewish culture whose terms and texts have been drawn largely by men.

Viewed externally, the Jewish woman has occasioned a range of stereotypes: the exotic beauty of the Jewess as depicted in European culture (for example, Rebecca in Ivanhoe); the graspy, whiny, or pushy woman in North American culture; the spoiled JAP of Jewish American men's writing.

As Jewish women themselves enter the public forum, finding voice as authors, playwrights, poets and film directors, they enact a kind of resistance against these externally drawn – and most often negative – images, by putting forth versions of their lives as experienced internally. Not a monolithic set of opinions, Jewish women's writing contains no singular image. Instead, there are diverse visions, diverse sets of images, often at odds with one another, and crafted by women who may differ in political opinion, religious practice, philosophy, education, nationality, personal sensibility.

Language has roots in Jewish past

Together, these multifarious images comprise the lexicon of a developing Jewish women's language.

Ancient Roots, Modern Sensibilities

Although a product of modernity (or post-modernity), this emergent language of Jewish women has deep roots in the Jewish past. Often, contemporary Jewish women's writing draws on traditional Jewish texts and liturgy. One interesting source for contemporary Jewish women's poetry is tchines – short, pithy prayers composed in Yiddish for meditation at candlelighting, childbirth and other events or crises in women's lives. Not formal liturgy, these petitionary prayers were recited privately rather than congregationally. They frequently expressed concern for family, marriage, fertility, health, and evoked the figure of the matriarchs, turning to them for blessings. Tchines (a Yiddish word derived from the Hebrew tchinot, or petitions) were originally written by yeshiva students in Yiddish for women, who were not expected to attend synagogue services, nor to be literate in Hebrew. Eventually, women began to compose their own tchines and to pass along particularly evocative ones. The research of women scholars, such as Chava Weissler, on tchines has shed much light on their initial composition and usage.

Later still, Yiddish women poets – such as Kadya Molodovksy, Malka Tussman and Rachel Korn – elaborated upon these simple prayers, composing poems that opened on their inner lives in heartfelt appeal, or that turned the genre on its head, challenging the traditional role of women in Judaism, or decrying the indifference or injustice of the Jewish God. Many contemporary women poets have adopted the genre and brought it across language boundaries, writing tchines-inspired poems in English, Hebrew and other languages.

Women writers also turn to the Bible, often reading stories about women in new ways, sometimes against the grain and with a critical but creative edge. A recently emergent genre – woman's midrash – mixes fiction with exegesis, inspired by the narrative commentary of classical midrash. Both traditional and contemporary midrashic readings of the Bible offer stories that probe gaps in the received text, exploring places that grate on the sensibilities of the reader. For example, the American novelist

'Countertexts' based on close readings of biblical passages

Norma Rosen has written a series of short stories she calls "countertexts," based on close readings of biblical passages and classical commentaries about women in the Bible. Poems such as those by Shirley Kaufman, Linda Zisquit and Rivka Miriam develop the genre in verse. Other such midrashim are published regularly in contemporary creative Jewish journals such as Kerem, Living Text, or (in the mid-1980s) New Tradition.

Academic scholars, too, are reading their way back into biblical texts, giving voice and language to gaps and silences about women. For example, the Israeli scholar Ilana Pardes uses contemporary research and methodologies in ancient Mideast cultures to deepen our understanding of enigmatic passages about women in the Bible. One illustration is her discussion of the perplexing chatan dammin ["bridegroom of blood"] passage in the book of Exodus, where Moses is attacked by a mysterious being on his return to Egypt from Midian. His wife, Tzipora, saves him by quickly circumcising her son (or, according to some readings, Moses himself), proclaiming her husband a "bridegroom of blood." Pardes links the figure of Tzipora – the name literally means "bird" – with ancient legends about Isis, the Egyptian goddess frequently represented with a bird's head. According to Egyptian mythology, Isis restores to life her mate (who is also her son) in a manner resonant with Tzipora's action.

Many Jewish women writers take on the theme of exile and home – a recurrent focus in Jewish writing generally, both in Israel and in the Diaspora – by giving it an added dimension. In addition to all of the other important associations those terms have accrued in Jewish culture, home signifies the special connection of women to domestic space, traditionally the realm of the feminine. Exile from home, then, is both punishment and privileged entry into male space. The Israeli author Ronit Matalon, for instance, contemplates displacement as a Jewish and human condition, seeing in perpetual motion a different kind of home, one open to creative reinvention. She recollects, for example, that her mother would often rearrange not only the furniture in the family's apartment, but even the configuration of rooms, going so far as to knock down walls on a moment's whim, often catching her father unawares when he returned home in darkness late at night.

A house where all is fixed in place, her mother would declare, is not a home but a "grave." By implication, she would transform her own life – restricted to the sphere of the domestic by the traditions that restrict women in traditional Jewish Egyptian families. If not actually journeying forth alone in the world, she could bring the journey inside, domesticate it, feel herself both at home and abroad at the same time. As for her husband, he would return from the late-night excursions forbidden to her, only to experience the unfamiliarity of exile while at home.

Kahana-Carmon notes that in the literary culture she was raised in, women authors are placed in a double bind. They are expected to produce writing that is stylistically "feminine" – that is, pretty, elaborately styled, elegant, dainty and light. When they fail to do so – when, for example, women write works that are gritty, raunchy, complex, biting or weighty – they are criticized for a kind of unwomanliness. When they write prettily, however, their work is praised and at the same time dismissed as superficial, trivial or lightweight.

Placed in double bind

Today, the range of Jewish women's writing has expanded broadly, as has the readership. No longer the province of recluses, their varied works speak to one another and to a growing audience across pages of text in an intimate grammar.

Sara Horowitz is the associate director of the Centre for Jewish Studies at York University in Toronto.

Poetry: a Jewish Canadian obsession

By B. GLEN ROTCHIN

Jewish poets come by their obsession with language honestly. It all began in the Garden of Eden when a slimy serpent fast-talked us into sin. From then on, we became marked by a unique sensitivity to the nuance and power of words.

The biblical journey from slavery in Egypt to freedom and the Promised Land is both a physical sojourn and a journey in language. Israel travels in the midbar, the wilderness, but the term takes its root from davar, which means "word." In a word-wilderness, Israel received the Asseret Hadibrot, literally, "The Ten Words," and the revelation at Sinai would define the mission of Israel and set the course for the Jewish obsession with words forever.

Poetry is the ultimate art form of language and meaning, so it's not surprising that Jews wholeheartedly embraced the craft. The prophets emboldened Israel with courageous visions, passionate voices and lyrical language. The warrior-poet King David united his kingdom and fired the hearts of Israel through the psalms, some of the most sublime verse ever written. In Babylonian and European exile, Jewish poets continued to sing praises to God even as they prayed for the renewal of Israel and the return to Zion. The most celebrated Jewish poetry of the Middle Ages is familiar to us as part of our standard liturgy. An example is the ninth-century mystical alphabetic acrostic El Adon.

The emergence of the Yiddish vernacular in Europe afforded the creation of a Jewish poetry which explored the daily struggles of life in the cities and shtetls. With Yiddish poets and fiction writers, Jewish literature now had forceful new voices serving to legitimize and affirm the everyday experiences of common Jews.

Jewish poets continued to sing praises to God

Yiddish literature added a whole new dimension to Jewish culture, one which would be successfully transplanted to the American continent through the mass migrations of the late 19th and early 20th century. There, the popular poetry of New Yorkers Mani Leib, Moishe Leib Halpern and Jacob Glatstein, as well as Montrealers Rochel Korn, Melech Ravitch and J.I. Segal, among many others, helped to root the European Jewish sensibility in new soil.

The very first significant intimation of a "Jewish Canadian" poetry appeared in 1863 with the North American publication of Voices From The Hearth by lawyer Isidore G. Ascher. Printed in Montreal prior to Confederation, the collection of poetry was written in a classical Victorian style and drew imagery for its Jewish poems from traditional liturgy. Ascher later returned to Britain and continued writing, so his book is best understood as a distant precursor to Jewish Canadian verse.

The development of Jewish Canadian poetry began in earnest during the 1920s in Montreal, following the phenomenal growth of the community and the founding of Jewish social, religious and educational institutions. Jewish writers were in a unique position to realize the creative possibilities of living outside both the French majority and the English establishment. They could maintain a strong sense of their own language and cultural uniqueness while at the same time exploring the opportunities presented by their adopted society.

A.M. Klein, first major Jewish Canadian poet

The desire to reconcile Jewish heritage and language with a modern multi-cultural sensibility is found in the work of A.M. Klein, our first major Jewish Canadian poet. Klein's early work demonstrated a poet grappling with one essential dilemma: how does someone write from an authentically Jewish perspective in a non-Jewish language?

Klein's first book, Hath Not A Jew, makes the case plain. Taken from Shakespeare's Shylock in The Merchant of Venice, the title showed Klein challenging all of English literature to clear a place for the Jewish voice. In the volume, he situated Jewish characters and textual references in a style of exquisitely rendered English verse. In this sense, the book was truly groundbreaking. Klein replaced the unsavoury Shylock with sympathetic Jewish creations drawn from traditional sources. By turning the English sonnet into a Jewish form, Klein opened the door for other Jewish poets to enter a new linguistic home.

Klein's poetic adventures extended beyond the borders of English styles. As a lawyer, he was fluent in French and as a Jew brought up in the Yiddish-speaking immigrant neighbourhood of Montreal, he had an affinity for Québécois folk culture. Klein was aware of the linguistic energies generated by the friction of cultures. For example, his poem Montreal is an experiment in melding French and English into a single lyrical innovation in perhaps the only poem ever written that can be understood almost simultaneously in either English or French:

From Montreal

O city metropole, isle riverain!
Your ancient pavages and sainted routs
Traverse my spirit's conjured avenues!
Splendor erablic of your promenades
Foliates there, and there your maisonry
Of pendent balcon and escalier'd march,
Unique midst English habitat,
Is vivid Normandy!

As Seymour Mayne writes of Klein in his seminal anthology of Jewish Canadian poetry Essential Words, "English Canada now had a poet who bridged the two official linguistic communities. It was no accident that it was a Jewish poet who fulfilled this task... At a time when Canadians needed to see themselves in their landscape and environment, Klein was the poet who helped shape Canadian self-awareness."

If Klein was interested in grafting a multicultural Jewish sensibility to the stalk of English lyrical conventions, Irving Layton was out to snap the branch off with a sharp tug. Layton fashioned himself as a visionary Jewish outsider. Like Klein, he wanted English poetry to accept the Jewish voice, but eventually insisted that it must be done on his own terms. He argued against the restrained quality of most Canadian poetry, offering instead a more robust, outspoken alternative.

Layton added a fresh and compellingly brash vocabulary to Canadian verse. He handled the subjects of love, sex, death and injustice with unprecedented power and frankness. The sense of moral indignation and rebelliousness that underlies many of his best poems placed Layton squarely in the Jewish prophetic tradition:

Veteran poets 'paved the way'

From The Search

Iconoclasts, dreamers, men who stood alone:
Freud and Marx, the great Maimonides and Spinoza who defied even his own.
In my veins runs their rebellious blood.
I tread with them the selfsame antique road and seek everywhere the faintest scent of God.

Winnipeg-born poet Miriam Waddington negotiated her own path along the Jewish Canadian divide. Her poetry demonstrated a concern for both contemporary social issues and an indebtedness to her Jewish heritage. As a scholar and translator of Yiddish poetry, she was instrumental in bringing the important contribution made by these poets to the mainstream. In an appealingly tight, lyrical style, Waddington attempted to bring Jewish worlds past and present together in a search for language and meaning:

From When We Met

Was I my mother?
Were you your father?
Did we meet on a street in Odessa or a birch forest on the Volga or was it at the artificial lake I dug out in miniature and planted round with tall buttercups for trees behind an old hotel in Winnipeg?

Why did it take me
so long to find our lost languages, to learn our songs?

Klein, Layton and Waddington, through their various approaches, paved the way for later generations of Jewish Canadian poets. Some drew their inspiration and material directly from Jewish sources while others preferred to maintain a certain distance and explore other cultural opportunities as they continued to arise.

Leonard Cohen initially grounded his poetic voice in Jewish sources with poems like Isaiah from The Spice Box of Earth.

From Isaiah

Between the mountain of spices
the cities thrust up pearl domes and filigree spires.
Never before was Jerusalem so beautiful…

…The rocks go back to water, the water to waste,
And while Isaiah gently hums a sound to make the guilty country uncondemned, all men, truthfully desolate and lonely,
as though witnessing a miracle, behold in beauty the faces of one another.

But Cohen's predisposition for artistic and spiritual experimentation led him in a direction that would neither affirm his Jewishness nor permit him to settle on poetry as his main mode of artistic expression.

Sakatchewan-born Eli Mandel was another poet who tended away from Jewish subjects in favour of other interests, including classical Greek mythology. In his poem Houdini, however, there is a subtle connection between the escape artist's Jewishness, death and a fixation with wordplay:

Latter poets make new contributions

From Houdini

I suspect he knew that trunks are metaphors, could distinguish between the finest rhythms unrolled on rope or singing in a chain and knew the metrics of the deepest pools

I think of him listening to the words spoken by manacles, cells, handcuffs, chests, hampers, roll-top desks, vaults, especially the deep words spoken by coffins…

The generation of poets who came of age during the 1960s and '70s vacillated between a fragmented sense of Jewish affiliation on one side, and broader local, national and international cultural trends on the other. Some, such as David Solway, Joe Rosenblatt, Tom Wayman and Artie Gold, demonstrated a certain ambivalence to their Jewish background. Nevertheless, these poets distilled the Jewish obsession with language into wholly original and individually recognizable contributions to Canadian letters.

Others, such as Seymour Mayne, Shulamis Yelin, Phyllis Gotlieb, Carol Rose, Joseph Sherman and Sharon H. Nelson, drew closer to traditional Jewish themes and imagery in their work. Yelin, a contemporary of Layton, only published her first book in the early 1970s. Steeped in Jewish spiritual sources and Yiddish literature, there was never a question where she would seek her inspiration:

From Seeded in Sinai

From the seeds engendered in me with the shattering of Tablets at the foot of Sinai comes my flowering…

Of the latter poets, Mayne distinguished himself through an unwavering devotion to the development of a distinctly Jewish poetic in the Canadian literary landscape. No other Jewish poet writing in English, perhaps since Klein, has so consistently and confidently expressed close ties with the inhabitants and land of Israel. Mayne also faithfully engaged Jewish texts and references as a means of renewing the traditional material. In the poem One from Song of Moses, he writes:

From One

And God said, Let there be –
…and hesitated. Wasn't it slightly off-key? They would get it wrong for centuries, perhaps even longer. A great smile widened over the deep. God said, Let there be a profusion of words on the tongues that will speak…

Several Jewish poets have emerged in the last 20 years who demonstrate a vibrancy and refinement of individual approaches while dipping only occasionally into overt Jewish subject matter. Saskatchewan-based poet David Margoshes, Montrealer Robyn Sarah and Torontonian Kenneth Sherman, to name only a few, have made notable contributions in this respect. Sarah, in the following example, reflects on gender divergence, polishing her poetic language against the grindstone of a male-centred biblical image:

Hope: a language of its own

By RABBI REUVEN P. BULKA

Hope is a most potent word, and an even more potent idea. Reflect, for a moment, on the many ways we employ the word hope in our daily conversation: "I hope you are well," "I hope to see you soon," "I hope you pass the exam," "I hope to be at the meeting," "I hope you enjoy yourself," "I hope you like it [the birthday or anniversary present]," "This task is hopeless." These are just a few examples.

Quite likely, if you kept count, you would be surprised at how many times you say the word "hope" during an average day. And each time, in all we do, we are expressing hope without even realizing it. We get up in the morning hoping it will be a good day. We go to work hoping we will do well. We eat our meals hoping we will enjoy them. We get married, hoping it will bring us happiness and contentment. We have children, hoping they will bring us joy.

These are all instances of what I call implicit hope. The hope is there, even though it is not explicitly expressed.

There is another form of hope, the hope with which we are more familiar. It is the hope that we mobilize within our psyches, or that is mobilized for us, when without it we would be lost, or at least in danger of being lost.

One example of this is when we lose our job, and we need to be hopeful that we will be able to feed our families. If we sink into despondency, we will not be able to lift our heads to recognize an opportunity when it presents itself.

Another is when we are saddled with a serious illness. There is no hard and fast correlation between hope and survival. Some people who have given up hope do nevertheless survive. Others who are full of hope nevertheless succumb. But it is generally acknowledged that the more hopeful an ill person is, the better that person's chances are for survival. Without hope, the body gives up, and is less likely to be able to fight off intrusions.

Then there is hope on a national scale. We get a taste of it every time we sing Israel's national anthem, Hatikvah, literally meaning "the hope." How wonderful and apropos a title this is. How descriptive it is of the main ingredient of our survival, the fact that we never lost hope, even when matters seemed futile and maintaining hope must surely have seemed delusionary.

This leads to a most interesting and challenging question. Why do I say that the main ingredient of our survival was hope, when it can be argued that the main ingredient in our survival was faith in God?

Indeed, what is the difference between hope and faith? The two are not as intertwined as we may think. It is possible to have no faith yet to be hopeful, if not on a national scale, certainly on an individual scale. And, surprising though this may seem, it is possible to have faith, but to lose hope. After the destruction of the Holy Sanctuary and the throwing of the Jewish people into exile, it is entirely possible that some Jews still believed in God, but lost all hope for a return to Israel.

At that time, with faith, hope was not guaranteed. Without faith, hope was impossible. But with faith, it was at least possible. And it was via hope, infused by faith, that we survived.

On a personal level, it is possible for a religious person to give up hope of recovery from an illness. And it is possible for an atheist to fight with determination against the ravages of disease, full of hope for recovery. I have seen these diametric opposites quite often.

Resurgence of interest in last decade

From A Man Has To Make Waves

What is it, in a man?
It is an unquiet thing in him,
a thing that beats
like a ram in a thicket,
– nor will be still until he seize it by the horns and offer it up to God.

In the last decade, a surprising resurgence of interest in an authentic Jewish poetic has developed. One result was a reappraisal and renewed enthusiasm in Klein's work among scholars, writers and readers. Another was the founding of Parchment in 1991, the first literary journal devoted exclusively to Jewish Canadian creative writing. Parchment was the idea of a group of writers, including Shel Krakofsky, a London, Ont., based physician and poet. As a leading proponent of the trend back to a Jewish esthetic, Krakofsky recognized the need for a forum that would acknowledge creative self-expression that was unabashedly Jewish. Krakofsky writes about his own unquestioned sense of Jewishness:

From Trapped in Mea Shearim

...Still, I am back with Zaida in his shtetl and like the ovens of Europe, I can never escape some places I have never been.

Parchment seems to be successfully cultivating a committed readership of Jewish Canadian poetry. The publication has enabled many poets like Ron Charach, Roger Nash and Malca Litovitz to develop their craft while enjoying an exposure that might not otherwise be available.

There are more practitioners than ever before and while the trend to return to traditional and historical Jewish sources is apparent, the poetic approaches have never been so diverse and ambitious. This may indicate a comfort with both the Jewish and non-Jewish sides of the poetic equation. I'm thinking now of Montrealer Stephen Schecter's recent epic, book-length poem called David and Jonathan, which reimagined the relationship, both real and implied, between these two biblical figures.

Another example is the series of poetic monologues by Toronto-based poet Harold Heft to be published this fall under the title The Shape of This Dying. Heft adopts the voices of several individuals, including Klein, to explore the life and death of the Montreal painter Alexander Bercovitch. Here is Heft as Klein meditating on the tension between the mortality of the artist and the "incomplete" nature of the art he pursues:

From The Poet Klein Editorializes

...And that is where incompletion is exposed. The immortality we seek is in that which we take, not what we leave behind. It is in the debt for marble chipped away, not in the value of the remaining statue...

Our obsession with language is healthy indeed if recent Jewish Canadian poetry is any indication. The enterprise is far from complete, the debt to poets who came before has yet to be fully repaid.

B. Glen Rotchin is a Montreal poet and co-editor with Seymour Mayne of two anthologies, Jerusalem: An Anthology of Jewish Canadian Poetry, and A Rich Garland: Poems For A.M. Klein, both published by Véhicule Press.

'Immediate' and 'ultimate' hope

But there is a difference between immediate and ultimate hope. The atheist has no ultimate hope, believing that there is nothing beyond this world. The expression of hope is for a limited engagement. On the other hand, the religious person who has given up hope only does so within the limits of this world, but remains full of hope about the world beyond, what we refer to as Olam Haba.

Hope is an especially important component of the Torah selections for Rosh Hashanah. We begin with God remembering Sarah, who, at an advanced age, conceives and gives birth to a son. Earlier, in a part that is not read on Rosh Hashanah, Sarah laughs at the thought that at her advanced age she can still have a child. Insofar as childbirth is concerned, she has given up.

An important part of Rosh Hashanah Torah selections

When the child is born, the name given to him is none other than Yitzchak, literally meaning "he will laugh": we laugh at the notion of hopelessness. We dismiss it as an undesirable ingredient in life. There is no room for it, it has no place in our lives.

We are again exposed to loss of hope as Avraham Avinu's second wife Hagar abandons her son, whom she is sure will die in the desert heat with no water in sight. Hagar cannot bear the prospect of watching him die, and so she gives up hope, leaving him to die alone rather than be with him. But she is jostled out of her hopelessness when she sees a well of water, from which she fills a flask and gives her son a drink. The message, once again: never abandon hope, especially when that abandonment condemns others in your charge to a tragic but avoidable fate.

The story of the binding of Isaac is a story of ultimate hope. The binding, the Akedah, is a complex episode with many nuances, but there is a hope ingredient in it that almost escapes us. Avraham Avinu is promised by God that his descendants will receive His blessing in the Holy Land. But Yitzchak is his only son from Sarah, and Sarah is by now 37 years older than she was at the time of his miraculous birth. If Yitzchak is now to be taken back to God, how will God's blessing to Avraham ever unfold? Without Yitzchak, there are no descendants via Sarah. And it is via Yitzchak, Avraham has earlier been told, that the Avrahamic posterity will unfold.

Avraham Avinu never loses hope

But Avraham does not raise the question. He trusts God. He knows that He will not break a promise, that He will somehow work it out. He never loses hope.

We see, then, that in our Torah reading selections, we are surrounded by the language of hope, even though the word "hope" is nowhere to be found in the actual text.

Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur are themselves all about hope: The hope that God will forgive. The hope that we will be given a new lease on life. The hope that our tomorrows will be brighter, both personally and communally.

At this time, we recite special psalm

And all through the time from Rosh Hashanah to the end of Sukkot, we add, twice daily, a special psalm, a selection from Tehillim. It is popularly called L'David Ori, but I like to call it the Psalm of Hope, not because other psalms are not full of hope – indeed they are. But this psalm, identified as Psalm 27, stands out because its culminating verse is a classic expression of hope. This verse reads as follows, according to my somewhat unconventional but "hopefully" more accurate translation: "Hope unto God, strengthen yourself, and God will empower your heart, and hope unto God."

L'David Ori

This verse, as indeed all of psalms, is loaded with profound insight. It is much easier to place our hopes in the laps of immediate and visible entities. We are more likely to place hopes for a job in a placement agency, for finding a spouse in the hands of a matchmaker, for a cure in the hands of a doctor.

Yet the first part of the verse tells us that this is an error. We err when we place our hopes with mortals. We can request of mortals, but the hope is always "unto God."

Classic expression of hope

To realize this, to switch our hope pointer unto God, takes strength, it takes resolve. Yet once we take that step, once we make that leap, we find that God empowers our heart, that He gives us a repository of strength.

Armed with that strength, we then jump into the next phase, when we again "hope unto God." This is hope of a different sort. In the first phase, we shift the compass of hope heavenward. In the second phase, we invest that hope with a sense of the ultimate.

A wish for a life of purpose, value

Much as we live in the present, our immediate desires are not always fulfilled. But it is the ultimate desires that are of greater importance, the desires that express ultimate, eternal, Godly values. This is what the content of our hopes should be, a wish for a life that has purpose and lasting value.

So the first exhortation to hope is a re-directional pointer; the second, a plea for the right content of the hope.

The Talmud (Berakhot 32b) uses this verse of Psalm 27 to back its statement: "If one sees that one has prayed but has not been answered, one should pray again." Perhaps the reason why you have not been answered is because you have prayed for the wrong things. Pray again, pray for the ultimate.

Another subtle message in this talmudic directive is equally instructive. What we translate as "hope" the Talmud employs as the word for "prayer." "Pray to God, strengthen yourself and God will empower your heart, and pray to God" is the Talmud's way of understanding the culminating verse of this Tehillim chapter.

Prayer and hope, meaningful hope – they are one and the same. We know the language of prayer. We have just now learned that this language is simultaneously the language of hope.

In this supplicative period, hope surrounds us and embraces us. All we need to do is realize this, and become infused with it. After all, hope is the indispensable language of life.

It's time to change language of crisis

By GIL TROY

Again and again in the coming weeks traditional Jews will beat their breasts and say: "For the sin we have committed before You by the expressions from our lips... For the sin we have committed before You with the words of our mouths... For the sin we have committed before You in profaning our lips... For the sin we have committed before You in the foolishness from our mouths... For all these, o God of forgiveness, excuse us, pardon us, grant us atonement."

The holidays force us to reevaluate the words we use

In many ways, the High Holy Days function as an advanced seminar on language. The prayers, and especially the viduis, the public confessionals, force us to re-evaluate the words we use, the conceptual structures we rely on, the linguistic habits we fall into every day. What Jews call tshuvah, loosely translated as repentance, moderns would call consciousness-raising. In both the traditional and the trendy processes, we focus on specific behaviours and identify deeper patterns, all as a prelude to change. The tendency these days, for those who bother to focus at all, is to concentrate on the individual words, the personal structures, the idiosyncratic habits we each have. But especially considering that the confessionals are in the plural, it is worth re-examining the language we use as a community – the ways we talk about ourselves, and the ways we talk to each other.

Far too often, the language of contemporary Judaism is the language of crisis. Today, as terrorists throw bombs at Jews daily, as knee-jerk critics lob rhetorical mortars at the Jewish State systematically, such a complaint may seem indulgent. For the sad truth is that Israel, Israelis, Jews and the Jewish people are in crisis. Dozens have been murdered, hundreds have been mutilated, and all of us are targetted. The renewed and reinvigorated assault on the legitimacy of the Jewish State encourages the violence and compounds the threat.

'We Jews respond much better to negative stimuli'

Nevertheless, despite the terror and the pain, the anger and the fear, we need to undertake our annual din and cheshbon, our personal and communal accounting. In fact, the response of the Jewish world this year to events in Israel is part of a broader – and troubling – phenomenon. We Jews respond much better to negative stimuli than to positive ones. I am not a good enough philosopher or psychologist to know how "Jewish" a phenomenon this is, and how universally "human" a phenomenon it is. All I know is that the language of crisis, the addiction to crisis, is deeply ingrained in the Jewish psyche – and is only reinforced by the very real challenges we do face.

Deeply ingrained in the Jewish psyche

It is a staple of Jewish humour – both crisis-mongering and the ability to laugh it all off. To the non-Yiddish speaker, Yiddish is a language of pain and sorrow, of oys and gevalts. Hundreds of Jewish mother jokes over the years have revolved around the formidable maternal figure for whom everything is a crisis – from streaked linoleum to the rise of the Nazis. And the backlash, the frustration with all the hysteria, all the guilt, is a staple of modern Jewish literature. In his infamous masterwork, Portnoy's Complaint, Philip Roth seethes: "And instead of crying over he-who refuses at the age of 14 ever to set foot inside a synagogue again, instead of wailing for he-who has turned his back on the saga of his people, weep for your own pathetic selves, why don't you, sucking and sucking on that sour grape of a religion! Jew Jew Jew Jew Jew Jew! It is coming out of my ears already, the saga of the suffering Jews!"

Yes, today the Jewish community is rallying around the blue and white flag. And, of course, that is a necessary and important response to the Palestinians' lethal rejection of the Oslo peace process. But as we all take up our battle stations, as we rally and lobby, as faxes fly and e-mail in-boxes fill, it is hard not to wonder whether we are simply falling into a familiar and possibly outdated pattern.

Are we falling into familiar, outdated pattern?

Consider the anomaly: exactly a year ago, when Israel was relatively peaceful and increasingly prosperous, how many of us paid much attention to it? More of us, it seemed, either disengaged, or dismissed the country entirely because it was too religious or too secular, too pushy and thus unpleasant, or too placid and thus not in need of us. A year ago, Israel fundraising was low on the communal agenda and the reasoning was quite clear: Israel did not "sell."

'Once again, North American Jews have rallied to defend Israel'

What a difference a year makes. Israel is back in fashion. Last spring, news reports about the American Israel Public Affairs Committee (AIPAC) Convention were practically giddy. The front page of the weekly Jewish newspaper, The Forward proclaimed, "Lobbying group in up mood at first parley of post-Oslo era." One AIPAC official rejoiced, "Membership is up, donations are up, and people feel charged."

Once again, North American Jews have rallied to defend the beleaguered Jewish State. The Jewish Federation of Las Vegas held a peace rally. The Jews of Chicago mounted a letter-writing campaign "To the People of Israel" affirming that "at this time of anguish and violence, our hearts ache and we grieve for your pain." Over 100 different Jewish organizations in Montreal united in a solidarity project to raise a dollar from each Jew in the city to help support trauma centres in Jerusalem under the tag line: "Everyone counts. It is not about how much, it is about how many." And from north to south, from east to west, the e-mails have been flying; the money has been flowing; the lobbyists have been arm-twisting; and the thousands of solidarity missionaries have been parading around Israel with that extra spring in your step that comes from feeling that you are being particularly brave (especially when what you are doing is extraordinarily safe and quite cushy).

'E-mails have been flying, the money has been flowing'

Unfortunately, a different reality has existed behind all this moving rhetoric and worthy action. Most North American Jews have gone about their daily lives; for them it has been business as usual, with maybe an extra grimace thrown in after the Dolphinarium disco massacre or the Sbarro pizzeria bombing. And with Israel-program providers experiencing drops of 60 to 80 percent in one year, it is clear that North American Jews have voted with their feet. The ads pleading "Show Your Solidarity with Israel" got it right. We have shown just how far our solidarity extends. It is easy to promise, as the Jewish Federation of Broward County, Fla., did, "You cannot stop us. You cannot keep us down. We will continue to live and thrive." But standing "in sombre solidarity with Israel" at the Bernard Milken Jewish Community Campus in West Hills, Calif., is one thing. Actually going to Israel is another – the friendship, in fact, may not be all that solid.

The sad truth is that many Israelis spent much of last year feeling very lonely. In mid-June, I received an e-mail from a recent olah (immigrant) from Montreal. She reported that she and her friends felt abandoned – few friends or relatives from back home were calling and giving her the moral support she craved.

'Let us acclimate to a new sound'

After visiting Jerusalem the golden, brassy Tel Aviv, and the green of the Galilee, visit the proud communities of North America. Behold the richness and yes, the riches, of North American Jewry. Institutionally, the American Jewish community sparkles from sea to shining sea. Out west, in Los Angeles, the Skirball Jewish Museum glistens atop the California hills, serving as an imposing sibling to the glorious, billion-dollar Getty Museum. In America's heartland, Cincinnati's Hebrew Union College remains a centre of Reform Jewry and the location of the splendid American Jewish archives. Out east, New York has dozens of formidable religious seminaries, especially the Conservative Jewish Theological Seminary and the modern Orthodox Yeshiva University. The sprouting of Holocaust memorials may not be to everyone's liking, but from the Mall in Washington to New York's Battery Park, who can doubt that the prominence of these institutions reflects the prominence and power of North American Jewry?

Too many of us denigrate those who disagree with us

Yet rather than celebrating this golden age of world Jewry, our language remains the language of pre-'48 oppressed Jewry. We careen from crisis to crisis, from the Arab-Israeli crisis and the Soviet Jewish crisis to the crisis of intermarriage and our "continuity" fears. When we talk about the good, everybody yawns; when we shout "never again," the heart stirs, the tears well, the money flows, and the action begins.

The same dynamic that plagues communal discussions about Israel distorts the Jewish identity issue. Those who sing, "Mah Tovu Ohalecha Yaakov" (How goodly are your tents, O Jacob) feel ignored. Those who shout "the sky is falling," command attention.

This pathology is most clear in the way too many Jews approach the intermarriage issue-crisis-phenomenon (how you fill in the last word reflects where you stand on the issue). Many more Jewish parents have berated their children "Don't marry out" than have taught their children the value of staying in the fold. Many Jewish parents, after 2½ decades of failing to excite their children about the joys of Judaism, go rushing to their rabbis when their children bring home a non-Jewish boyfriend or girlfriend. All of a sudden, the alarm bells ring, the guilt begins, the hysteria mounts. But the message "Don't marry a non-Jew" sounds provincial at best and racist at worst to the children raised with egalitarian values. The negative, the "you should not," does not work anymore. It is far more effective to work on celebrating the joys of living a Jewish life, which includes building a Jewish family.

The ways we talk about ourselves, the constant claim that our communal ship is sinking, poisons the way we speak to each other. If we view every communal challenge as a matter of life and death, our rhetoric necessarily intensifies. As a result, too many of us, on too many issues, choose to denigrate those who disagree with us. Too many of us commit verbal violence against each other regularly, instinctively. This past June, when the leader of the Reform movement cancelled all of his movement's summer trips to Israel, he did not simply say, "This was a difficult decision, honest people can differ." Instead, he demagogically and self-righteously pronounced, "We don't make political statements with other people's children." The comment implied that those who continued with the summer programs were indeed exploiting "other people's children." That insensitive remark provoked an equally unacceptable response from an Israeli politician, dismissing Reform Jews as interested only in "bagels and lox."

There is an Arabic expression, sikin b'sikin (knife to knife), which means that each blade sharpens the other. Verbal violence begets verbal violence. The combatants in that case deserved each other.

Similarly, in the last few years the community has become increasingly polarized over the religious issue. Too many liberal Jews who pride themselves on their tolerance for diversity, spit out the word "Orthodox" as if it were an epithet. And too many religious Jews ignore the importance of "klal Yisrael," the unity of the Jewish people, by dismissing less traditional Jews as "goyim."

For too long, our Jewish agenda has been distorted and driven by what we have feared. Jean-Paul Sartre may have overstated it in 1946 when he claimed that "it is the anti-Semite who makes the Jew" but it certainly seems that it is anti-Semitism and other challenges that make Jews passionate. Even during this time of crisis, we have to look for what we love, what we can love, and what we can learn, both from Judaism at its broadest, and from Israel itself. Better to view Judaism as a chocolate layer-cake, multi-dimensional and gushing with goodness, than to keep on sucking on our Philip Rothian "sour grapes."

During the McCarthy era in the United States, the patron saint of American liberalism and two-time Democratic candidate Adlai Stevenson said, "Patriotism is not the fear of something, but the love of something else." This Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur, as we beat our breasts and confess our sins, let us acclimate our eyes, ears, hearts, lips and mouths, to a new sound – a more upbeat melody that emphasizes the good, and that speaks a language of Jewish optimism and hope rather than a language of Jewish defensiveness and fear.

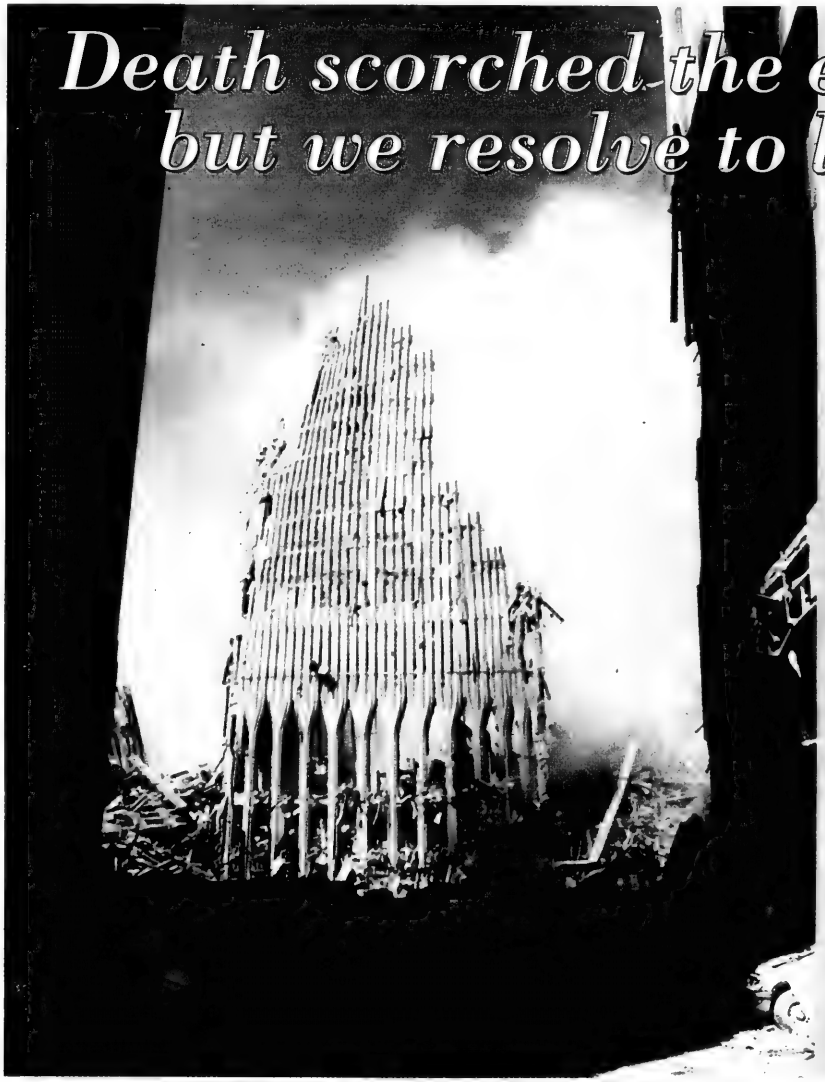
Death scorched the earth but we resolve to live



The landscape is one of complete devastation, desolate, destroyed. The teetering last remnant of what was once New York's World Trade Center, a small jagged, sharded facade of one of the buildings, strains upward toward the highest part of heaven, a makeshift monument to the horrible, hideous death that hurtled from the sky last Tuesday morning and scorched the earth.

Editorial

What is there left to say?

Most of the earth's inhabitants have undoubtedly seen the unbelievable images of the hijacked airplanes slamming into the twin towers, minutes apart; of the fierce, red-orange fires exploding in all directions; of the thicket of black smoke pouring out and upward, engulfing the sides of the stricken buildings; of the handful of doomed, helpless individuals trapped above the raging fire, impossibly far away from safety, facing the terror-filled truth of their imminent deaths; and then the implosions of the buildings, collapsing upon themselves, like two mortally wounded giants expiring, their enormous strength spent, their existences at an end.

CJC Reacts

TORONTO — Canadian Jewish Congress expressed "shock and horror" at the series of terror attacks in the United States last week. "We extend profound condolences to the many victims and their families. Our hearts are with the people who have suffered so terribly today," said CJC president Keith Landy. "While this attack is obviously unprecedented in its enormity, we must remain calm while the situation is assessed. We call for our community and for all Canadians to carry on as normally as possible under the circumstances. We are sure the Canadian government and our security and police services will take the appropriate measures called for by this situation." Added Landy: "We strongly condemn these evil acts and call on Canada and all civilized countries to take determined measures against the international or domestic terrorists, who have declared war on freedom and on democracy."

Islamic Statement

TORONTO — The Canadian Islamic Congress has condemned the U.S. attacks. In a statement, Congress president Mohamed Elmasry said, "We are deeply, profoundly shocked at what has happened. Whoever planned and executed these heinous acts is insane. We can only hope and pray for the many victims and their families. For Muslims, even the taking of one innocent life is like killing all of humanity; it is against all we believe and are taught as children of God."

Israel

'Never Surrender'

JERUSALEM — Israel's president, Moshe Katsav, last week called the terror attacks in the U.S. "a turning point in the history of humanity. The world has changed and must be rebuilt from scratch on strong moral foundations… The attack in the United States is a declaration of war against the free world and against morality and justice, and it is forbidden to surrender," Katsav said.

Sharon's Statement

JERUSALEM — The following is the statement by Prime Minister Ariel Sharon following the terror attacks in the United States: "On behalf of the people of Israel, I wish to send our deepest condolences and heartfelt sympathy to the American people, President [George] Bush and the entire United States government, following the terrorist attacks against the United States and against our common values. The fight against terror is an international struggle of the free world against the forces of darkness who seek to destroy our liberty and our way of life. I believe that together, we can defeat these forces of evil. In this most difficult hour, all Israelis stand as one with the American people. Our hearts are with you and we are ready to provide any assistance at any time." Israel declared Sept. 12 a day of mourning.

Rescind Orders

JERUSALEM — Sephardi Chief Rabbi Eliyahu Bakshi-Doron called on Islamic clerics who ordered suicide bombings to rescind those orders and to forbid large-scale attacks on innocent civilians. "I call on the leaders of the Arab world who are condemning this terrible tragedy to call on religious leaders to immediately cancel the definition of a suicide bomber as a martyr and forbid all large-scale attacks." Rabbi Bakshi-Doron stated.

Jubilant Palestinians Threaten Journalists

NABLUS — The Associated Press last week refused to release its footage of Palestinians celebrating the terror attacks on New York and Washington. The move came after Palestinian militiamen threatened to kill the AP cameraman.

In the West Bank, thousands of Palestinian men, women and children took to the streets of Ramallah and the Balata refugee camp in Nablus. They sang, danced and handed out sweets.

In Nablus, armed Palestinians reportedly trapped foreign photojournalists inside a hotel to prevent them from covering the festivities.

The revelry spread to eastern Jerusalem, and Arab television networks rushed to deliver the pictures to the entire Arab world.

Similar scenes occurred in the streets of Baghdad. Iraqi leaders remained silent, but state-controlled media said the "American cowboy" deserved the attacks for its "crimes against humanity."

Community on security alert following attacks

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A bomb scare led to the evacuation of hundreds of elementary school students at the Bayview campus of United Synagogue Day School (USDS) last week.

Staff at the Beth Tikvah Synagogue, which shares a building with the school, received the bomb threat at 12:45 p.m. last Thursday. School personnel immediately implemented its security protocol and evacuated the children in an orderly manner, according to Bernie Farber, executive director of the Ontario region of Canadian Jewish Congress.

Police searched the building but found no bomb, he added.

Classes at USDS, which had experienced a bomb threat earlier this year, resumed the next day.

The bomb scare came only days after Jewish organizations, community centres and synagogues across the country were advised to go to a heightened state of alert in the wake of terrorist attacks in the United States. The warning came in the midst of an already high state of vigilance that Jewish groups normally adopt in the High Holy Day period.

Congress said the decision to issue the warning was purely precautionary. "Police and security services are saying very clearly there is no indication of any threat to Canada or to the Jewish community," said Congress spokesman Manuel Prutschi.

"Nevertheless, in light of the horrendous events [in New York and Washington], prudence dictates that we issue a high security alert to all communities and institutions across the country."

Community organizations are being asked to refer to written guidelines that were distributed long before the U.S. attacks, and put into place the guidelines' security measures.

"A high level of vigilance should be in place until further notice," Prutschi said.

Farber pointed out that USDS/Beth Tikvah implemented the security protocols effectively, leading to a rapid evacuation of the building and notification of police.

Police had stepped up their patrols following the U.S. bombings, Prutschi continued. "Police

The Canadian connection

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — News of a Canadian connection to last Tuesday's horrific terror attacks in New York and Washington will doubtless revive debate in this country on the presence of suspected terrorists, and their freedom to go about their deadly business.

U.S. media outlets were reporting throughout the week that at least five people involved in the attack entered the United States from Canada.

If true, that would embolden those who view Canada as soft on terrorism.

Experts say terrorists are attracted to Canada because it is relatively easy to enter and leave; cash can be raised and sent overseas; one can be anonymous in a multicultural society; communications aren't monitored; and there's a generally quiet atmosphere.

And, of course, large American cities are just a few hours' drive away.

In a CJN interview last week, Liberal Senator Jerry Grafstein blasted Canadian laxity when it comes to fighting international terrorism and curbing the activities of those in Canada with suspected ties to terror groups.

"We've been lax on security in several ways. For one, there's no parliamentary overview, no standing committee in the House of Commons dealing with that," Grafstein said, adding that the Senate does have a standing committee on security matters.

"We have a serious lapse when it comes to internal subversion," he was quoted as saying. He called for a public inquiry "into the whole question of Canada supporting or providing bases for terrorist networks."

The matter is bound to become a high priority in this session of Parliament, which opened Monday, Grafstein believes.

High on the agenda will be Bill C-16, which has been stalled in committees since its introduction in March. The bill would strip charitable status from groups that raise money for international terrorist organizations, and would target domestic social welfare groups, clubs and other front organizations posing as charities. The Canadian Alliance has proposed that such fund-raising be made illegal altogether.

Grafstein sees last Tuesday's attacks as "not just an attack on the United States, but an attack on democracy [and] on Canadian nationals too."

Last February, Canadian Jewish Congress urged Ottawa to beef up its fight against terrorism.

CJC presented a six-point plan to several government departments, calling for tighter border and immigration controls, better support of security services and stricter enforcement of the Criminal Code.

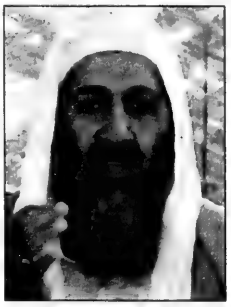
Earlier this month, it was revealed that Mahmoud Jaballah, an Egyptian refugee claimant arrested three years ago as a terrorist suspect, worked for a brief time as part of cleaning crew at the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

Court documents alleged that Jaballah admitted ties to members of Al Jihad, which the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS) says is a radical offshoot of the Muslim Brotherhood and is allied with Osama bin Laden, widely believed to be the prime suspect behind last Tuesday's terror attacks in New York and Washington.

Critics of Canada's laxity often point to the case of Ahmed Ressam, a Montreal shopkeeper from Algeria who was arrested in Dec. 1999 trying to sneak a trunkload of bomb-making materials across the British-Columbia-Washington state border. The bombs were destined for Los Angeles Airport, where they were to be detonated to usher in the new millennium.

Ressam arrived in Montreal on a false passport in 1994, and applied for refugee status, admitting he'd spent five months in detention in Algeria for confessing to having been an Islamic terrorist.

He failed to turn up for his refugee hearing, and was deemed to have abandoned his claim. He appealed that decision to the Federal Court, lost, and was issued a deportation order. Instead of being forced to leave, he was ordered to report to immigration officials once a month. This went on for over two years.



Osama bin Laden

Ressam stopped checking in, and in 1998, he was arrested by Montreal police for stealing laptop computers and cell phones. He served two weeks in jail. By then, he had faked a Quebec baptismal certificate to acquire a Canadian passport in another name.

At Ressam's U.S. hearing, the judge blasted CSIS for having destroyed wiretap evidence.

At the time of his arrest for attempted bomb-smuggling, U.S. authorities said Ressam was connected to the Algerian Islamic Group, a violent terrorist cell known by its French acronym, GIA. Around the same time, U.S. officials arrested three other Algerians, including one who had walked across the Canadian border through some woods into Washington state.

Ressam, currently awaiting sentencing, has been linked to bin Laden.

Last year, a CSIS report warned that an increasing number of extremist acts are being planned in Canada.

The report said terrorist activity in Canada was undergoing a "dangerous evolution." Whereas extremist groups once used Canada primarily as a base for fund-raising and support, they have escalated their activity to include the preparation of terrorist strikes, the report said.

"We have noticed a disturbing trend as terrorists move from significant support roles, such as fund-raising and procurement, to actually planning and preparing terrorist acts from Canadian territory," the report stated.

Testifying in 1998 before a Senate committee, CSIS director Ward Elcock said Canada is home to more international groups with suspected ties to terrorism than any other country except perhaps the United States.

"We know that the infrastructure has been established here to support a terrorist act in Canada," said Elcock. Over the past decade, many terrorist groups have used Canada as a haven, a source of financial and material support, and even a base of operations, he said.

He cited Canadian ties to suicide bombings in Israel and to the 1993 World Trade Center bombing (one of the suspects was said to have escaped through Canada).

Elcock said CSIS was investigating about 50 organizations, including groups linked to Hezbollah and Hamas.

In 1997, CSIS said Hezbollah had established an infrastructure in Canada that can assist terrorists seeking safe haven in North America.

Also in 1997, one of two Palestinian men arrested for planning the bombing of a Brooklyn subway was said to have sneaked in and out of Canada with ease.

Hani al-Sayegh, an admitted member of Saudi Hezbollah, was detained by Ottawa on suspicion that he helped carry out the 1996 truck bombing that killed 19 U.S. soldiers in Saudi Arabia. He was said to have provided CSIS with evidence that Hezbollah had set up a base of operations in Canada, before his deportation in 1997.

The same was found in 1994, when a suspected member of Hezbollah was deported from Canada.

And in 1991, Ottawa admitted that it had allowed a man wanted by French police as a member of Islamic Jihad into Canada as a refugee. The man later fled the country.

Jewish community helps stranded Israelis

By PAUL LUNGEN
and LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporters

TORONTO — Ever since the chilling terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center in New York, Canadians have been anxious to show their support for the victims, to lend a hand, to somehow, tangibly, do something that helps.

Last Tuesday, Toronto's Jewish community rallied to help El Al passengers diverted to Toronto when U.S. air space was closed to incoming flights.

It may not have equated with firefighters searching for survivors, but the spontaneous demonstration of compassion and caring answered the deep-seated need of many to come to the assistance of others under stress.

More than 100 families volunteered their homes to billet almost 400 El Al passengers who were en route from Israel to Newark, N.J. The number of volunteers was so overwhelming that dozens were turned away when all the passengers had been accommodated.

After spending the night in volunteers' homes, about 100 passengers chartered two buses to ferry them to New York (fortified by food donated at no cost by Tov-Li Pizza and Yehudale's Pizza), while others tried to find their way to the United States individually. Some chose to spend their vacations in Canada, while 100 others decided they wished to return to Israel, said El Al spokesperson Stanley Morais.

"The community showed its strength by opening its hearts and homes," he said.

The series of events that led to the outpouring of community support began with a routine flight from Tel Aviv to Newark. Part way through the flight, while the jetliner was somewhere over the Atlantic Ocean, the flight crew were told they would not be allowed to land in Newark. They were told to return to Israel, but the captain demurred, telling air traffic control he did not have enough fuel to turn around.

Stranded Israelis get help in Toronto.

Joining more than 200 U.S.-bound flights diverted to Canada, El Al 19 was originally slotted for a landing in Gander, Nfld. In Toronto, El Al's staff fought to have the plane re-routed to Toronto. The plane, they knew, is an afternoon flight that is regularly crowded with Orthodox Jews, elderly people and many women and children. In Gander, they would not be able to find kosher food and many, unable to speak English, would be totally out of their element, Morais explained.

When aviation authorities relented and allowed the plane to land in Toronto, El Al contacted community leaders to help arrange accommodations for the soon-to-arrive passengers. The airline chartered eight buses and on arrival, the passengers were taken to three locations: the Lubavitch Community Centre in Thornhill, the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre (BJCC) and Yesodei Hatorah, a synagogue in the Bathurst Street and Lawrence Avenue area. There, numerous families were already on hand to offer their hospitality to the travellers. The BJCC was ready to offer cots and hot showers to anyone who could not find a billet.

Spokespeople for both Lubavitch and Yesodei Hatorah said as soon as people realized that flights to the United States were cancelled, they called to offer their homes. In addition, representatives of Bar-Ilan University (BIU) and Hatzoloh, a volunteer paramedic group, were on hand to provide assistance.

Jerry Tollinsky, national director of Canadian Friends of BIU, said that "people cared so much and were so affected [by events in New York] they wanted to be part of the process of assistance when they could."

Families were paired with travellers, and accommodations were found for everyone, he said.

Jeannette Adams, a staff member of the Lubavitch Community Centre, said most of the El Al passengers, "being Israeli, and more used to this kind of thing, were more stoic than one might expect. We were glad as a community to do what we could," she said, noting that many in the Lubavitch community had relatives and friends in the New York area.

Dina, a staff member of Yesodei Hatorah who would only give her first name, said people were given supper at the synagogue, and then taken to volunteers' homes.

Meanwhile, Lubavitch Rabbi Moshe Spalter collected donations from Perls, Sobeys and Elite salads – a vanload of food and drinks – and brought them to the airport to provide food for passengers of other flights who needed kosher food.

"I called airport administration to ask permission to come in to bring the food and to see what we could do, but they never called us back."

Rabbi Spalter, together with some young men of the organization, decided to go anyway, and they set up a stand to give away the kosher food. They were unceremoniously kicked out by airport administration, with no explanation.

Steve Shaw, vice-president of corporate affairs and communications for the Greater Toronto Airport Authority, said that while the rabbi's actions were "nice and thoughtful," nevertheless "it was inappropriate because of security concerns in the terminal area. Security was paramount, and the Peel Region Police were worried about food packages being distributed."

Due to the hectic nature of the day, Rabbi Spalter's call was not returned, he said.

Teaching children to cope in times of crisis

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — During times of crisis, parents often find themselves glued to their television sets watching horrific news and television reports.

However, parents need to be careful how much news children are exposed to, said Teri Kay, director of family and community services at Jewish Family & Child Service.

Young children shouldn't be allowed to watch repetitive television clippings of the tragedy, Kay said.

One of the lessons learned during the Gulf War was that, with best of intentions, parents watching the crisis on television with their kids were exposing children to too much stress, she said.

The horrors on the television may be too much for children to bear, said Otto Weininger, a professor of child psychology at the Ontario Institute of Studies in Education – especially for kids who have been affected by this atrocity, by continuing events in Israel or by the Holocaust.

Parents should be turning on radios instead of TVs, he added. "Radio is a much softer medium and parents can continue talking calmly to their children while the radio is on."

Kids of various ages will respond differently to the tragedy, Kay said. It is important for parents to listen to children and not be afraid to talk about what happened.

How much information needs to be discussed depends on the child, Weininger said. Parents should take cues from their kids and not overload them with too much distressing information.

Children need to be able to express their fears without feeling undermined by their parents' anxieties.

"Let them ask the questions," Weininger said.

Young children especially need to be paid close attention.

Many of a young child's anxieties centre around the fear that something may happen to their parents, he added. For that reason, it is important for kids to feel that parents are in control.

Sometimes, "young kids don't have the verbal skills to articulate their feelings and may not have the appropriate responses to situations," Kay said.

Some children arriving at Jewish day schools may be startled by the police officers there as part of the heightened security.

Remains of the World Trade Center. [RNS/Reuters photo]

Parents need to help younger kids by encouraging them to express their feelings by doing things like drawing pictures or taking part in physical activities, Kay noted.

Weininger said that children may be experiencing bad dreams at night or appear distracted during the day.

"It's important not to belittle the dreams and to be constantly reassuring them that they will be safe.

"Simply having their parents around them is reassuring."

It's important not to treat middle-school kids like young children, Weininger said. However, they're not ready to be exposed to all the news.

Kids need to feel their environment is safe and they're not helpless, Kay said.

"They should be able to speak about their feelings in a calm, controlled environment," Weininger said. "Kids shouldn't bury their anxieties because they will only resurface in other ways."

Boys and girls may express their worries in different ways – boys could become more aggressive and girls more concerned.

If kids are distracted at home or in the classroom, it may be because they don't want to deal with their anxieties, Weininger added.

Parents also need to be sensitive to their children's levels of maturity. When ready, teenagers should be included in the more adult discussions.

Older kids should be encouraged to talk about what is going on with their friends and take part in community events.

After the Sept. 11 tragedy, some of the Jewish day schools organized rallies and special prayers.

In the classrooms, teachers should be encouraging kids from Grade 4 onward to engage in meaningful action, said York University professor Alex Pomson.

Pomson, co-ordinator of the Jewish Teacher Education Program at York, noted that teachers can turn kids from passive recipients of terrible information into active researchers so that they don't feel so powerless.

In geography or language arts classes, students could engage in analysis so that they can try to make sense of the events. Various curriculum suggestions are available on the Internet, Pomson said.

Jewish schools could engage in Tikkun Olam projects such as fund-raising endeavours for those who have suffered so that kids have a way to deal with the events in a meaningful way, Pomson said.

Before Grade 3, teachers have a duty to respond to kids who bring the issue into the classroom.

However, teachers should keep it simple.

"Kids at that age see things in binary terms – good and evil," Pomson said. "You need to reassure kids that there are plenty of good people out there and that they're safe."

We resolve to live

As the towers crumbled, more than 5,000 people were pulverized into a vast, grey rubble, their lives taken from them because they were nothing more to the murderers than obligatory details on a grisly to-do list, than detritus on a sidewalk.

The sheer evil of the acts was unimaginable, or so we thought, or so it should have been. But it was not, alas, to the people who planned and perpetrated the murders.

Now, more than a week later, we are still numb from the dull ache of disbelief that continues to gnaw at our subconscious.

Memorial services have been held around the world; leaders and statesmen have expressed their condemnations; commentators and analysts have shared their expertise. The macro issues arising from this grotesque terrorism are being dealt with by our elected officials and by our security personnel. But the micro issues fall to each of us, individually, to deal with. Beyond the unanswerable question "Why?" we are left with the compulsory question: "What must we – each one of us – do now?"

To guide us in our struggle to find answers to this rather important and urgent question, perhaps we might find our inspiration in the actions of the firefighters and police, the men and women who risked their lives last week in order to save other lives. As people were running away from the unfolding massive terror, the firefighters and police were actually running towards it, to rescue, to comfort, to aid. More than 300 of them lost their lives.

When questioned late last week, one firefighter, having worked through the chilly, wet night, still desperately seeking any stirrings of human life in the death-drenched debris, explained his determination. "My mind was set when I came here that we would not give up. It is our duty as firefighters. What keeps me going is seeing everyone working together to achieve one goal: find survivors."

Thus, we must find our example in the "ordinary" firefighter, in whose behaviour, nothing has been ordinary. Like the firefighters, we, each one of us, must never give up being sentinels and sentries for the values we so deeply cherish. Like the firefighters, we too – personally and collectively – have duties; namely, each day to be exemplars of those values.

Whatever challenges and difficulties lie ahead, as our society confronts the people who planned and perpetrated the terror last week, we, like the firefighters, must remain individuals of courage and compassion, of goodness and decency, a testament to the excellence and indomitability of democratic ideals and the democratic way of life.

The landscape of destruction has been watered by countless tears.

But it will soon again bring forth life.

Though death scorched the earth, we resolve to live.

Fight for freedom

Last Tuesday was a day of mourning, one which will forever live in our hearts and minds and serve as a constant reminder of the pervasive evil and hatred from the far depths of this earth. There are numerous questions, some or most of which, will forever remain unanswered.

The objective of these terrorists was to shake our foundation, our stability, to set us off balance. True, there is evil in this world. But there are more good people than bad. It's up to each one of us to continue with our daily lives, to stand strong and to believe that freedom will prevail.

Each of us must work harder to fight hate and intolerance in our daily lives. Take a moment today to do one good deed that will have a ripple effect on society and send a message back to the forces of evil that they cannot possibly shatter our lives, our liberty and our peace.

In the words of Simon Wiesenthal, "Freedom is a gift from heaven... We must fight for it every day." The fight began last Tuesday.

Canada should have left Durban

The UN must have known that the true agenda of the Durban conference was Israel- and United States-bashing, and yet the UN organizers did nothing to stop it. They could have, at the very least, ensured that anti-Semitic signs did not appear, but didn't do so. Even the countries that objected to the procedures objected to the language used, not to the essence of the conference. Israel and the United States were right in protesting its essence as well as its wording. It was surely a conference designed to denigrate the United States and Israel and nothing more.

To give a parallel example: if the UN were to hold a conference on criminal activities with the Taliban, Iraq, the Mafia and the Hell's Angels as participants and with the main agenda being the redress for damages that law agencies have done by "wrongfully imprisoning innocent persons," would Canada attend in order to reduce objectionable wording? Does this make sense? Should not the conference be boycotted to protest its wrongful nature and esence? The answer is obvious. We should not have taken part in conferences designed to promote hatred and the destruction of our best institutions and countries.

The Durban conference essentially gave the green light to anti-Semitism and hatred against Israel and the United States and approved the promotion of hatred and baseless bigotry. It was not a success but the beginning of the disintegration of the values of liberty, tolerance and honesty.

Correction

As a result of typesetting errors, some words were omitted in the following letter published last week, unintentionally changing the meaning. We reprint the letter below, with the omitted words included in italics.

Opposes Syria's candidacy

Anything other than a resounding negative vote (not an abstention) by Canada on Syria's candidacy for a seat on the United Nations Security Council would be a betrayal of everything for which this country stands.

In addition to its sponsorship of terrorism, its continued occupation of Lebanon and its dictator's brutish anti-Semitism voiced in front of the Pope, Syria's abysmal record of ignoring human rights has existed for decades.

Its oppression of its minorities has been catalogued by such organizations as Amnesty International and Middle East Watch. The brunt of this oppression was visited upon its Jewish community which was held hostage for over a half century.

That a country which ransomed off human beings in the latter part of the 20th century, extorted bribes to permit Jewish businessmen to maintain their activities, and which lived by the rule of arbitrary arrest and imprisonment without charge or trial (or sometimes trial in a kangaroo court where defendants were not permitted legal representation or the right to speak), would be laughable if it were not so serious.

Canadian governmental authorities have been well aware, over these many years, of that kind of treatment meted out by Syria to its Jewish population, and for a country that has always prided itself on preserving human rights, it would be hypocritical for Canada to avoid doing everything in its power to block such a scandalous elevation.

In what sometimes seems to be a world gone mad, it would be a welcome breath of sanity for Canada to take the principal position and vote "no" as a clear example for all UN members.

Our solidarity mission to Israel

We recently spent three busy days in Israel, meeting with speakers from the Ministry of Defence, Foreign Affairs, Immigration and others, as well as with the mayor of Jerusalem. We visited the Ethiopian settlement in Jerusalem and the absorption centres. We marvelled at the help Israel offers the olim, subsidizing each family for a period of nine months. Everyone we met welcomed us with open arms, happy to see Jews from Diaspora. Missions leaving from Toronto, Montreal, the United States and other parts of the world are helping morale in Israel. All of us were happy to be there.

Perspectives

Hate speech & terrorism

By HOWARD ADELMAN

Is there any relationship between the events at Durban and the unspeakable terrorist hijacking of four planes, two of which were used to demolish the World Trade Center in New York, with the loss of thousands of innocent lives?

There is almost certainly no direct organizational link. But there are important similarities. In Durban, an anti-racist conference was turned into what Elie Weisel described as a "circus of calumny" against Israel. In New York, civilian airliners were hijacked and turned into lethal gigantic Molotov cocktails that destroyed the economic hub of the capitalist world.

Those who use and abuse language to create a tissue of lies and a mountain of hate are linked to those who hijack civilians for suicidal Kamikazi attacks that reduce elegant towering skyscrapers into a mountain of rubble and collide into those buildings with such force that millions of pieces of paper are turned into missiles that penetrate car tires for blocks around. There is a link between hijacking conferences and hijacking civilian aircraft.

In both cases, the instigators are non-state actors who view America and Israel as the twin evils that are to be attacked. In both cases, an Orwellian world is fostered. In one, language with meaning and sense is turned inside out. In another, peaceful means of transportation and communication are turned into lethal bombs. A barbarian world of nihilism and destruction is fostered.

The NGO forum in Durban voted to allow each caucus to express its grievances in its own way so language could be used to mean anything. Except for the Jewish caucus.

The language describing Jewish victimization was removed from the final declaration. Yet the final document was celebrated as a product of consensus, a consensus achieved by shouting down even those who favoured multiple expressions. In a conference with pages and pages of resolutions denouncing any incitement to hatred, anti-Jewish hatred was manifest in demonstrations and placards. In a conference that repeatedly celebrated the values of inclusion, Jews were excluded as a people deserving self-determination. The members of the Jewish caucus were demonized, delegitimized and marginalized.

The term "Holocaust" with a capital "h" was coined to apply to the genocide of Jewry in World War II. The most repugnant assault on language was the attempt to appropriate the term to apply to any disaster.

The first draft proposition, under "Victims of Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance," number 36, read: "We salute and acknowledge the memory of all victims of racism, racial discrimination, xenophobia and related intolerance, slavery and the slave trade, colonialism, [[holocausts/Holocaust], [ethnic cleansing of the Arab population in historic Palestine] and in Kosovo and apartheid and foreign occupation all over the world and at all times]." The conjunction of "holocaust" and "ethnic cleansing" were two totally inappropriate depictions of the Israeli/Palestinian struggle.

In another twist, Tim Wise, a self-professed anti-Zionist Jew, charged Israel with anti-Semitism against the Arabs since the Arabs are Semites. Here again, a term, born in the latter half of the 19th century explicitly and exclusively to depict hatred against Jews, was misused, this time to misdescribe most Jewish attitudes to Arabs.

The debris of the World Trade Center

But for the delegates at the NGO Forum, words could be used in any way a caucus decided, except for the Jewish caucus. As Marwan Bishara of the Center for Policy Analysis on Palestine in Washington wrote, "All the caucuses voted against their cynical use of anti-Semitism."

Any delegation that criticized the language was labelled pro-Israel defenders of the Sharon government and anti-Palestinian. While appropriating the language of liberal rights groups that Jews had played a prominent part in creating, the language of genocide and the Holocaust was expropriated from those who truly suffered that fate. At the same time, Jews were not permitted to describe their own past history of victimization in these terms.

Bishara lauded the 3,000 NGO delegates for turning the Durban conference into a success story. Solidarity with Palestine was a rallying cry of consensus, he claimed. The NGO forum was declared democratic (who elected the delegates?) and transparent – yes, in its intention to delegitimize Israel.

It is no surprise that Weisel declined Kofi Annan's and Mary Robinson's pressures to participate when the term "democracy" and "transparent" are applied to PLO militants who intimidate and murder those who co-operate with (not spy for) Israelis. Bishara characterized the results as "a victory for international civil society" and popular movements. In fact, it was a victory of the new partnership between good intentions and evil goals, between the morally righteous and calculating fanaticism.

I returned from Ethiopia immediately before the cataclysmic attack on New York and Washington. I had been collecting material on the deportations of Eritreans by Ethiopians and of Ethiopians from Eritrea. In both cases, large numbers of each group had been born and raised as minorities in the other group's state. But no one suggested this "voluntary" population exchange was a holocaust or even ethnic cleansing. In fact, I could find no evidence that the issue was even raised in Durban. Yet words like holocaust, genocide, colonization, oppression and apartheid were used to label Israel. An Arab elected representative of the Knesset in Durban said he was a victim of apartheid, as if his situation bore any resemblance to the situation of Blacks in apartheid South Africa that did not allow Blacks any representation, let alone the opportunity to speak critically and openly of his own state to the media.

This year, 2001, is the UN International Year of Mobilization against Racism, Racial Discrimination, Xenophobia and Related Intolerance. The World Conference Against Racism (WCAR) was intended to mobilize efforts to eliminate racism.

A clash of opinions at Durban [RNS Reuters photos]

But the conference was hijacked. It was used as a forum for anti-Israel diatribes. Israel was chastised as racist for defining itself as a Jewish state though many European countries define themselves as Christian states while guaranteeing equality to citizens of all faiths. Many Muslim countries define themselves as Muslim states and do not guarantee such equality. Yet they were not targeted. Many countries (for example, Japan, Germany) guarantee automatic rights to return to their nationals wherever they were born and brought up. But only Israel was criticized for having similar laws.

Israel has been described as an outpost of American imperialism even though it was America that led the world community in rolling back Saddam Hussein's efforts to conquer Kuwait, an Arab country.

Israel has been described as an outpost of American colonialism on the fringe of the Muslim and Arab world even though relatively small numbers of North Americans (regrettably or not) have moved to Israel. In addition to the Sabras, Israel has largely been settled by Jews from Arab lands, European Jewish survivors of the Holocaust whom no other country would admit, Jews fleeing from the collapsing Soviet Union and the resurgence of anti-Semitism in Russia, and Jews fleeing discrimination and impoverishment in Ethiopia.

What the gentle and self-righteous NGOs and the terrorists share in common is the demonization of America as the "Great Satan" with Israel as its junior partner. The humanitarian NGOs are more polite. But they are no more sensitive or correct in their depiction.

Comment after comment after the inferno of the World Trade Center was made stating that the "chickens have come home to roost," "America has reaped what it has sown." Immediately after deploring the bombing as a deplorable act, these commentators stressed the importance of understanding that the roots of such violent behaviour rested in the oppressive, imperialist and colonialist policies of America. Similarly, Yasser Arafat pledged to reject violence, yet his return to violence was said to be "understandable" and has been excused.

There is an American conspiracy to control the world. There is a Jewish conspiracy to control the world. There is an American-Jewish conspiracy to control the world. This crude formulation permeated the thoughts and politer language of the NGO delegates at Durban consciously and unconsciously. It is a language shared by terrorist organizations that target the United States. Obscene thoughts produce obscene language and result in obscene, horrific actions.

The use of words to misinform rather than inform, to deceive rather than enlighten, to purvey falsehoods rather than truth, is a practice as old as language. Speech conceals as much as it reveals. It is used to disseminate lies perhaps even more than to distribute facts and analysis. And I am not speaking of dissimulation to avoid persecution, but of deceit to foster persecution.

Words are used to sow the seeds of toxic hatred in children who grow up to be suicide bombers who graduate from the destruction of coffee houses and discotheques in Israel to the commercial towers of New York. Once the foe was identified and branded, the abusers of language and of the freedoms America offers could follow Bertolt Brecht's rhetorical query from The Measure Taken. "What meanness would you not commit to stamp out meanness?" Terrorists have simply graduated from the willingness to abuse language to the willingness to abuse the families of tens of thousands of civilian victims.

Zionism under attack

This article is being written while the Durban Conference, allegedly dealing with racism, is still in progress, and by the time you read this you will know whether the disgusting motion to single out Israel and Zionism for obloquy went into the record books, or whether it was "toned down" to some degree. Israel and Jews are often in the news these days, second in frequency only to the reportage on sex crimes and automobile accidents.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

Astute observers have repeatedly pointed out that the current campaign of vilification is not directed at Zionism alone, whose real nature is of no interest to its detractors. They have two main targets: one is the Western world and its culture, and the other is the Jewish people – a modern update of old-fashioned anti-Semitism.

As reasonably literate people ought to know, "Zion" stands for the Promised Land, and for Jerusalem in particular. Ever since biblical times, Zion was to be the place where Jews would worship God and experience the benefits of observing Divine commandments. During two millennia of exile from the land, this became a fervent dream, of which Zionism was the political expression. Jews would take their place among the nations and have a state of their own like everyone else.

Born in war, Israel became the only democracy in the Middle East, but even if it had been perfect (which, being human, it could not be), it would not have been embraced by the world as a state among equals. Its democracy, its reclamation of swamps and desert and its scientific and economic achievements aroused not admiration but envy. The legitimacy of the State was negated from the beginning by Arabs and others, and when all else failed, the enemies' target was enlarged to include all Jews, worldwide. Even the dead were not left alone, and today, Holocaust denial is a standard aspect of anti-Zionist propaganda. The isolation of Jews and Israel has wrapped itself increasingly in the mantle of Nazism.

No wonder that this development has had a serious effect on the Jewish psyche, both in Israel and in the Diaspora. Israel looks to the Jews of the world for support, but not all Jews are ready to give it. They themselves feel attacked, which has led many to devalue Zionism – word and content.

A term of pride has thus become an embarrassment to quite a few of our people. Obviously, we have not made as good a case for Zionism as we should have done (and neither has Israel itself), but that should be no reason to abandon ship. I myself am planning to visit the Jewish State later this week, and when I come back, I hope I have more to say on this subject.

May the new year be a better one for our people.

'Don't let the light go out'

Last Chanukah, I received a card and newsletter from someone in the United States. The card said: "Happy Chanukah and Happy New Year." Initially, I thought that I was the only one perturbed by this "ecumenical" card, but after reading it, my mother had a few thoughts about it, too.

Darcie Richler in Halifax

Only in America, we thought, would they encompass the secular new year and Chanukah into one card. Only there would they temporarily put aside our own new year, Rosh Hashanah, which actually falls in Tishrei (which normally corresponds with September or October).

Much of American assimilation has been a result of the Jewish immigrants of the first half of the 20th century wanting to fit in once they moved to the United States. Social acceptance to anyone is important; however, to many of the Jews coming from Europe, it was even more crucial. Another issue was the disillusion with religion for many Holocaust survivors. These two factors played a role in why many ultimately intermarried, eliminated their ethnicity and refused to be part of Jewish community. The children of that generation did not obtain a strong Jewish identity, so they could not be expected to pass on strong values to their children. It is now 2001 and much is uncertain. In the United States, the Jewish community has barely increased by one fifth while the population as a whole has doubled.

American assimilation is no longer something that we as Canadians should pass off as a problem just south of the border. We are living in a time where Judaism is really being threatened through the assimilation of holidays, where "everybody" celebrates Christmas, because it has been so commercialized that many do not even associate it with anything Christian. I have acquaintances who will categorize themselves as Jewish, but really, that is all that is Jewish about them.

Things can get confusing when living in the Maritimes. While the Jewish communities are small in general, they are still strong and vibrant. One can be involved very readily in any given community, but at times it is easy to feel alienated. Many school-aged children here might be the only Jewish kids in their classes. For them, it can be difficult to start explaining why they do not celebrate Christmas or Easter, or furthermore, why they miss school a few times during September and October. It is even more important here to differentiate oneself from the other religions.

And what if one is not deeply observant – not eating the "forbidden foods" but not maintaining a kosher kitchen? Do not fret if you fit the picture. I celebrate all of the Jewish holidays, but I do not always go to synagogue for every moment of them. Although I might not attend for all of the holidays, I will definitely not go to class; how would that look for those who must justify why they will not work or go to school on such a day?

As the musical artists Peter, Paul and Mary once sang about Chanukah, "Don't let the light go out, it has lasted for so many years...," we must remember it too, especially around this time of renewal. Our ancestors moved away from anti-Semitism in Europe and other unfriendly places so that we could live our lives in freedom, where we do not have to be afraid to show our faith and beliefs. For some there is the mitzvah of following the Talmud on a rigid line, but we should all consider applying the principles of religion that have meaning for us to our lives. More important, we should try to maintain as many of the traditions as possible that have been passed on, and hopefully learn about other ones. Religion is here to guide us and provide insight for times that are good and bad. Let us not allow ourselves to lose our identities to a religion of secularism.

Until next month, I want to wish you all Shanah Tovah. For Israel may the new year be more peaceful than the one that is about to end.

A new chapter, a new experience

University hallways are now bustling with eager students looking to find their place in the "real world." Psychology classes are bursting at the seams and a new crop of first years are walking into school with bright eyes and high hopes. This is the time when lives change, when old friends drift, and when getting together means calling a friend who lives several hundred kilometres away.

Bryan Borzykowski in Winnipeg

The transition from high school to university can be a difficult one. There are many reasons for the stress of first year, such as fear of the unknown, the fact that marks actually count, and those hundreds of pages of reading that you are faced with on the weekend.

When I started university, the biggest change for me was that several of my friends went to schools outside of Winnipeg. Even today, four years later, people are still leaving the city either to attend an out-of-province university or to begin jobs in bigger cities. It is very difficult to see your friends leaving, because it means that you have to admit things are never going to be the same. This is a legitimate anxiety for students and at least for me, it affected my daily routine for a while.

Part of the stress that comes with friends leaving can be attributed to a little bit of jealousy. Your friends begin a new experience, become independent and meet fresh faces. For the last three years, I have wondered what is beyond the confines of my experiences in Winnipeg. After this year, I will hopefully be moving to Toronto and finally see what else is out there. The funny thing about moving to Toronto is that most of my friends who have moved away in the last few years have ended up there and many others will eventually move there as well.

Winnipeg's politicians always ask and continually work to answer the question, why are young adults leaving Winnipeg? Winnipeg is a great city with a friendly atmosphere and plenty of opportunities for teenagers. The problem begins when these teens begin to enter university. Whatever the city has to offer slowly begins to look less appealing, and the opportunities become harder to find. Unfortunately for Winnipeg, it is not the centre of business and industry in Canada – Toronto and Vancouver are.

Toronto is appealing to me because the opportunities for journalism appear more fruitful than they do in Winnipeg. There are more newspapers to write for, more action to seek out, more magazines looking for contributors.

I do think Winnipeg has increased its appeal over the past years. Izzy Asper has helped to create a more competitive business school and he is also bringing more opportunities and jobs for people living here and challenging other businesspeople to invest in the city, in order to retain and encourage young adults to stay or move here.

Yet young adults do not only move away because of work. Many move away for independence, to begin a life on their own, something which cannot be avoided. It is human nature to want to get your own apartment and buy your own things, and I think this is something that a lot of people overlook when discussing the reason that people leave Winnipeg. People don't have to leave town to become more independent, but I think that it is more appealing to try out someplace new.

For those first-year students, the disappointment of groups disbanding and friends departing mingles with feelings of excitement: the excitement that university is a new chapter in life, and whether it be in Winnipeg or somewhere else, the opportunities and experiences are just beginning.

The Kirshner File

What the terrible events of Sept. 11 mean

The horrific images sear the mind and assault the senses: thick, black smoke billowing from the north tower of the World Trade Center in lower Manhattan seconds after being rammed by a hijacked commercial airliner piloted by terrorists; a fireball engulfing the upper floors of the centre's south tower after being hit by another kamikaze-commandeered aircraft.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Within about two hours of being penetrated by these malevolent missiles, both skyscrapers, shining bastions of American capitalism, crumbled into sickening, stomach-turning heaps, consigning thousands of terrified, hapless bankers, lawyers, stockbrokers, clerks and secretaries to a horrible death under the sheer weight of molten, twisted steel, chunks of concrete and shards of glass.

In this grey zone, a scene of sooty desolation previously thought to be the exclusive domain of fervid Hollywood blockbusters such as The Siege or Independence Day, we awoke to a new, ominous reality that may well define the 21st century.

The unimaginable tragedy that befell New York City on the morning of Tuesday, Sept. 11, truly a day of infamy, was not just America's worst peacetime catastrophe, far surpassing the 1995 Oklahoma City debacle, but the opening shots of a much more deadlier phase of global terrorism, the bane of civilized societies.

The barbarians who initiated and carried out the attacks against the World Trade Center and the Pentagon in Washington, D.C., and who apparently tried to crash a plane into the White House, stand in the vanguard of a phalanx of new-age terrorists where ends justify bloody-minded means.

These audacious, meticulously planned attacks represent nothing less than a declaration of war against the United States and its allies and the values and norms they uphold. As political theorist Samuel Huntington observed, we face the bleak prospect of a seminal "clash of cultures" whose outcome will surely shape our universe.

The perpetrators of these crimes, who supposedly wielded knives and cardboard cutters and who exhibited not the slightest regard for the men, women and children they would callously kill in fiery crashes, left no return address.

As I write these lines, no group has taken credit, and probably never will. But circumstantial evidence strongly suggests that the mastermind is none other than the infamous Osama bin Laden, the Yemeni-born Saudi fugitive and avatar of Islamic fundamentalism who has been linked to the 1993 bombing of the World Trade Center and the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania. At present, he is in hiding in Afghanistan, protected by the rigidly Islamic Taleban regime.

In 1997, a bin Laden acolyte, the Kuwaiti Ramzi Ahmed Yousef, was convicted of directing and helping carry out the 1993 bombing, which consumed six lives. In 1996, Sheik Omar Abdel Rahman – an Egyptian fellow traveller – and nine of his followers, including El Sayyid Nosair, the assassin of Rabbi Meir Kahane, were given lengthy prison terms for a plot to bomb the United Nations, the George Washington Bridge and the Holland tunnel in New York City.

This past summer, several men of Arab descent were sentenced for their involvement in the embassy bombings in Africa. All had ties with bin Laden.

Ahmed Ressam, an Algerian national who was caught before he could unleash an attack in Los Angeles, was a bin Laden recruit, too.

Bin Laden, the originator of the International Islamic Front Against Jews and Crusaders, issued a fatwa – or religious order – in 1998 calling upon Muslims "to kill U.S. citizens, civilian and military, and their allies everywhere."

Three months ago, Israel's defence minister, Binyamin Ben-Eliezer, warned that bin Laden was trying to build local cells in Israel and the territories. Gen. Amos Malka, chief of Israeli intelligence, disclosed that bin Laden was working closely with Hamas, whose suicide bombings have left a grisly trail of blood, gore and body parts in Israel since 1994.

Over the short run, the events of Sept. 11 will pull the United States still closer to Israel, its most reliable ally in the Middle East. Since the birth of Israel in 1948, and particularly in the past few years, Israel has been victimized by Arab terrorism. It is a phenomenon the United States has felt deeply itself.

In 1983, Hezbollah, an Islamic group aligned with Iran, bombed the American embassy and the U.S. Marine Corps barracks in Beirut, mowing down scores of diplomats and soldiers. In 1995 and 1996, Islamic bombers attacked U.S. facilities in Saudi Arabia, a training centre and an apartment building, killing 26 servicemen. Last October, the Cole, a U.S. destroyer docked in Aden, Yemen, was bombed by terrorists reportedly associated with bin Laden, leaving 17 sailors dead.

And now this.

Having been bloodied on home ground by what appears to be the forces of Islamic fundamentalism, the United States will now better appreciate Israel's existential predicament and its need to vigorously confront its enemies in the absence of a viable and credible peace process.

Realizing that the Sept. 11 events have strengthened Israel's alliance with the United States, Muslim spokespersons have launched a concerted campaign to persuade U.S. public opinion that Israel's methods of dealing with the Palestinians have in fact spawned the rotten excesses of Islamic fundamentalism.

Smoke pours from a World Trade Center tower.

Israel's sometimes unwise policies toward the Palestinians, its encouragement of Islamic elements in the 1970s and 1980s as a counterweight to the secular PLO and its victory in the 1967 Six Day War, doubtless gave Islamic fundamentalists a sense of purpose, momentum and invincibility.

More importantly, however, Islamic fundamentalism, which threatens Israel as much as secular Arab regimes, is a product of widespread poverty, recurrently high levels of unemployment and endemic waste and corruption in the Arab world.

It is also a reaction against modernity, material consumerism and Western "infidel" culture and beliefs.

Washington's support of Israel, especially during the current Palestinian uprising, is a factor as well. It explains why some Palestinians in the Palestinian autonomous areas broke into spontaneous celebrations after hearing the news that airliners had smashed into the World Trade Center and the Pentagon. Their joyous outburst was a public relations disaster for the Palestinian Authority. In a desperate attempt at damage control, Hanan Ashrawi characterized Palestinians as fellow victims, while in Gaza, Yasser Arafat was photographed donating blood to the American victims.

Islamic fundamentalism was revitalized by four additional factors: the 1979 Islamic revolution in Iran, the 1989 rout of the Soviet army in Afghanistan, the U.S. military presence on Arab soil and the 1991 Gulf War.

Bin Laden denounced and never reconciled himself to the airlift of U.S. troops and equipment to Saudi Arabia – the birthplace of Islam – during that war. And he was irretrievably offended by the allied economic sanctions imposed on Iraq and the punishing air strikes that turned Iraq's industrial infrastructure into a smoldering wreck.

There are innumerable reasons for the growth of Islamic fundamentalism, but Israel's existence and its desire for security are the least of them.

Jewish Life

Portal into our past

By ZE'EV GLICENSTEIN

Edmund Scheuer (1847-1943), an early Jewish leader in Hamilton and Toronto, is known for founding the first religious school in Hamilton, the first Reform temple in Canada (Hamilton, 1882) and for bringing many changes to the Holy Blossom congregation in Toronto. A justice of the peace since 1902, he also attempted to found a Jewish agricultural school in Georgetown, Ont.

Known for his philanthropy, the Prussian-born Scheuer was the oldest established diamond importer in Canada. One shouldn't really be surprised, then, to discover (as I did recently) that he sailed from Southampton to New York in 1923 in the distinguished company of Lord Beaverbrook, prime minister William Ferguson Massey of New Zealand and Prince Dimitri of Russia. Also on board the S.S. Aquitainia were a clutch of high-ranking diplomatic officials from Europe and Japan and sundry bank officials, civil servants and buyers from the T. Eaton Co.

The passenger list is easily available through the Ellis Island Data Base (EIDB) Web site, located at www.ellisislandrecords.com. What is less easily available are answers to the many questions it raises. Were Scheuer and Beaverbrook friends? Was their trip a trade mission? Like most genealogical-historical documents, this one is swathed in mysteries that demand further research.

As I wrote in a previous column, the EIDB Web site makes the passenger records of some 22 million immigrants accessible to the public. I am writing about it now to report that a couple of computer-savvy members of the Jewish genealogical community, Stephen P. Morse and Michael Tobias, have developed an innovative search tool that helps enormously in pinpointing ancestral names in EIDB that may be terribly misspelled and thus hard to find.

The Morse-Tobias search tool, located at http://home.pacbell.net/spmorse/ellis/ellisjw.html, is especially designed for searches for Jewish passengers by a variety of simultaneous parameters, including name, age, year, ship, port and town name.

Some researchers have reported success by searching by town name and only the initial of an ancestral surname. An elusive ancestor named Hersz Poznanski of Vilna, for instance, might turn up in a search for all the P surnames from Vilna, under the erroneously transcribed name of Porransky. The search can be done on a year by year basis, if necessary.

The Morse-Tobias search tool makes it easy to find Canadian Jews like Scheuer, who were returning home from Europe via New York. Here are some family names that came up by searching under the town name Montreal and the initial P: Pappelbaum, Paskin, Pierce, Pozner. Using Toronto and the initial L: Lavine, Levin, Levy, Lewis, Lipowice, Litowitz, Lorie, Lubelsky. Using Winnipeg and the initial G: Gassner, Goodman.

Starting in the 1880s, the Statue of Liberty shone a beacon of light and hope to millions of Jewish immigrants from Europe and Russia who became the "poor, tired, huddled masses yearning to breath free" that Jewish poet Emma Lazarus immortalized.

Today a new beacon – the Ellis Island Data Base – is attracting the contemporary Jewish masses. Anyone whose ancestors landed in New York between 1892 and 1924 stands a good chance of recovering an important part of their family history at this remarkable site. Once considered the portal to a new future in America, Ellis Island now offers a wonderful portal into the past.

Good Books: The newly published Discovering Your Jewish Ancestors, by Barbara Krasner-Khait (Heritage Quest) is one of the best general reference books I've seen in several years. And so popular has the subject become that even Reader's Digest has gotten into the act: its Genealogy Handbook, by Ellen Galford, is a colourful and appealing beginner's guide.

The Holocaust in one volume

The Holocaust Encyclopedia, edited by Walter Laqueur, Yale University Press, 2001.

This massive tome of 765 pages is the only comprehensive single-volume work of reference that provides both a reflective overview of the Holocaust, as well as overflowing detail about every aspect of the subject.

The entries are arranged alphabetically from "Albania" to "zyklon B," the cyanide compound used in the Nazi gas chambers. More than a hundred experts from a dozen countries contributed to this vast project, including such well-known authorities as Raul Hilberg, Saul Freedlander, Michael Marrus, Robert Wistrich and Ruth Bondy.

A host of subjects, which are discussed in lucid and readable essays, include: the major ghettos and concentration camps, gypsies and homosexuals, the Holocaust in cinema and television, resistance in Eastern Europe, the Righteous among the Nations, Nazi policy, Holocaust denial, displaced persons, religious life, Russia and the Soviet Union, memorials, historiography, and American and British Jewry.

Laqueur is among the world's pre-eminent historians of modern Europe and a leading authority on the Holocaust. In his preface, he indicates that many new facts became known during the last decade of the 20th century, especially in the former Soviet Union and the countries of Eastern Europe. Important archival material is still unavailable, for one reason or other, to scholars, but "it is most unlikely that any future revelations will necessitate a radical revision of the present picture."

It is doubtful, he believes, that a written order by Hitler concerning the extermination of European Jewry will ever be found. There is no reason to assume that such an order ever existed in writing. "The greater the crime, the less the likelihood that written evidence will be found at the highest level of government," he writes.

It is surprising that widespread interest in the fate of European Jewry developed only in the 1960s, beginning, perhaps, with the trial of Adolf Eichmann in Jerusalem. Claude Lanzmann's nine-hour documentary Shoah, released in 1985, had a much greater impact on public consciousness throughout the West than had any earlier work. In the Third World there was little or no interest in the Holocaust, a subject remote from the Asian and African experience.

Laqueur is forthright in his opinions: Neither the Roman Catholic nor the Protestant churches, and not even the international Red Cross thought that they had been guilty of major sins of commission or omission as far as the murder of Jews was concerned. Even documents cannot possibly tell the full story. After all, they "do not smell, they do not starve or freeze, they are not afraid."

For those who question the lack of Jewish resistance, Laqueur responds, "It is both unethical and indecent to pass judgment on the behaviour of persons in the most extreme peril of their lives and the lives of their families in the 1940s, from the vantage point of the present and with the benefit of hindsight."

The volume includes a full chronology of events for the years 1933–1945 and an up-to-date bibliographical essay including Web sites. The volume includes 276 photographs and 19 maps. Many of the searing photographs are the work of Adam Kaczkowski who beginning in 1960 spent 10 years in a photographic tour of Polish extermination and concentration camps.

A vast library of Holocaust literature now exists, but The Holocaust Encyclopedia will endure as an indispensable tool to explore an inexhaustible subject for many years to come.

Peace for ourselves & with God

By RABBI YEHIEL BEN AYON

Yom Kippur is a time of dissociation. One tries to remove oneself from one's failings and falsehoods.

When the final declaration of the Durban conference was read, Canada was the first to take to the microphone to dissociate itself from its failings and falsehoods.

"Canada is still here today only because we wanted to have our voice decry the attempts at the conference to delegitimize the State of Israel and to dishonour the history of the Jewish people."

These noble words of Paul Heimbecker, our ambassador to the UN, were drowned by the loud cries of "Shame! Canada, shame!"

Shame indeed to the conference and to the nations that participated in this great farce. The very same world conference against racism succeeded in itself becoming pro-racist.

At this time, in today's world – with the Hutus and Tutsis of Rwanda; China and the people of Tibet; the situation in Zimbabwe; India's caste system; the Kurds in Turkey, Syria and Iraq; the Christians and Muslims of Sudan; the Native North Americans; and the Catholics in Ireland – to single out Israel as the centre point of concern is outrageous.

Of course, any meeting blessed with the participation of the likes of Fidel Castro and Yasser Arafat and graced by African heads of state who themselves daily outdo each other in setting new standards for tyranny, corruption and oppression of their own people, is doomed by its own hypocrisy.

It wasn't only the Americans and the Israelis who walked out of this performance. On Saturday afternoon, a roll call was taken. Only half of the hundred and sixty three countries in attendance at the opening session still had delegates on the floor when the final declaration was adopted. Presumably, those who left did so in frustration and in recognition of both the futility and stupidity of this charade. Sadly, the high principles that the gathering was to address were effectively derailed by its own anti-Semitic and anti-Zionist mischief.

Shame! World shame!

From the very beginning, the people of Israel viewed the Durban conference with bitter cynicism. For them, it was yet another meaningless world condemnation. What matters to them is that Palestinian terrorism has turned the Middle East into the Wild West, where a trip in which one ventures anywhere away from home can be potentially deadly. It is a "situation" in which life certainly continues, and in which one makes do as best as one can and should. But all the while, everyone knows that before the "situation" gets better it will probably get worse.

On Yom Kippur, as we stand before God, each with our own prayers, prominent as always among them is the prayer for peace. May we strive for peace, first inner peace, then peace amongst ourselves, a peace that reconciles one to another, and then peace that reconciles us towards God. Then, please God give us Your divine gift of peace – osei shalom b'imromav, hu ya'asei shalom alaynu ve'al kol Yisreal.

Yom Kippur, food & the Web

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

Yom Kippur food. It may almost seem like an oxymoron.

After all, Yom Kippur is the day that we refrain from food and drink so that we can focus on repentance and prayer. But there are plenty of mitzvot, customs and even recipes that tie the fast of Yom Kippur to food. Today, a look at Yom Kippur and food on the Internet – along with tips to make the fast go as easily as possible.

The final meal before Yom Kippur is called Seudat Mafseket, or "the final meal." According to the Talmud, eating the day before Yom Kippur is a mitzvah equal to the mitzvah of fasting on the day of Yom Kippur [http://judaism.about.com/library/holidays/highholidays/bl_yk_fast.htm]. As for the meal itself, "It is traditional to eat soup, but important to put as little salt and seasoning in the soup as possible. The boiled turkey or chicken from the soup can be served as a healthy pre-fast entrée. It is also traditional to serve the soup with kreplach, dough filled with potato, because we hope any strict judgment from God will be covered with kindness." [http://judaism.about.com/library/food/bl_recipes_yomkippur.htm].

If you are looking for some other ideas for the pre-fast meal, there are suggestions of everything from sautéed porcini chicken and arugula salad [http://www.cjnews.com/pastissues/00/sept21-00/food/food1.htm] to Moroccan chick pea soup with tomatoes and rice along with potato and leek kugel [http://www.jpost.com/Editions/2000/10/02/Food/Recipes.13062.html].

Your preparation for the fast should start well before the final meal. Several sites have tips to help you ease through those 25 hours of fasting. Here are some:

• Drink lots of water, about two litres the afternoon before the fast. Diluted orange juice is also good but alcoholic beverages will make you dehydrated [http://www.joi.org/celebrate/yomkipp/fastpig.htm].

• Don't stuff yourself. Eat a normal meal that emphasizes carbohydrates and some protein.

• Taper off caffeine in the days before the fast. According to dietician Judy Baumann, "The nausea and headaches many people report while fasting have nothing to do either with food or fluid. They are usually the result of caffeine withdrawal." [http://www.jflmail.com/articles/1380.html].

• Another site suggests that if you eat at regular times, then you should vary your meal schedule the week before the fast so that your body won't expect to be fed at precise times. On Yom Kippur itself, don't hang around people who are talking endlessly about food and hunger [http://www.jewfaq.org/fasttips.htm].

Although most people can tolerate fasting for a day, pregnant women, nursing mothers and people with diabetes should get medical and rabbinical advice. "These women do not have to be put at risk," says Rabbi Dovid Goldwasser of Congregation Bais Yitzchak in Brooklyn, N.Y. "God's most important commandment to the Jewish people is to respect their bodies" [http://www.riskworld.com/PressRel/1999/PR99aa77.htm].

After the sun has set and the final blast of the shofar has been sounded, it is time to break the fast. It is often ended with something sweet to represent the sweet year ahead – apples or challah dipped in honey [http://food.homearts.com/food/cookings/bringhom/90kipp11.htm]. Dr. Elliot Berry, head of clinical nutrition at Hebrew University Hadassah Medical School, suggests a non-carbonated drink and a slice of bread or cake one hour before a full meal [http://www.jewishsf.com/bk971010/ustips.htm].

Once that hour is over, you may want to eat something a bit more substantial. At Joan Nathan's American break-the-fast buffet, you'll find recipes for challah, lick-your-fingers kugel, whitefish salad and cheesecake [http://www.epicurious.com/e_eating/e06_jewish_cooking/recipes/yomkippur.html]. If you're really adventurous, try a traditional Italian Yom Kippur break-the-fast meal. La Vigilia di Yom Kippur consists of triglie con uvette e pinoli (reef mullet with raisins and pine nuts, a Roman Jewish dish that likely dates back to ancient times), polpettone di tacchino (turkey loaf in broth) and bruscandole (a sweet made with toast, sugar, spices and wine) [http://italianfood.about.com/library/weekly/aa091299.htm.

Have a tzom kal – an easy fast!

Kids help kids deal with trauma of terrorism

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Yeshara Gold knows the strength of kid power.

A Miami native who has lived in Jerusalem for 25 years, Gold is founder of Kids for Kids, an Israeli-based organization that has kids helping out other kids who have been "orphaned, maimed and traumatized by terrorism."

Gold, a journalist with five children ages 11 to 19, said she knows of many children who are afraid to go to school.

"When travelling by bus, some children put their feet up when they pass through an Arab village so if a bomb goes off they won't lose their legs. Others have begun bed-wetting or sucking their thumbs.

"There are a lot of problems. It is a very sad situation," said Gold, who was recently in Toronto, New York, Dallas, Los Angeles, Denver and Florida to raise awareness of the organization.

The idea for Kids for Kids was "so simple that I can't understand why it was not done before. It just became so obvious to me. Arabs were using their youngsters as fodder; they used their children for violence.

"Our education and our direction has always been towards kindness. It is simple for children to do kind acts for other children," she says.

Among its activities, Kids for Kids has children making hospital visits and bringing gifts, performing concerts for injured children, and conducting international e-mail get-well letter campaigns.

As well, Kids for Kids arranges appointments for kids at a psychology clinic, and is seeking funding for a crisis intervention training program which will enable relatively isolated settlements to manage community crises. "When children are affected by a trauma, someone has to be there, and that is why we are training lay people."

It also arranges for fun, yet therapeutic activities such as visual and performing arts sessions with traumatized kids. "In all these activities kids are volunteers and kids are recipients of the kind acts," said Gold.

As one of their fund-raising projects, said Gold, they produced Jewish New Year cards from kids' artwork. "We had children in New York raising money through a read-a-thon, and we also have a CD of music performed by singing stars who donated their time. Children around the world will be selling these CDs, with proceeds going to the program."

Kids for Kids does not have a fixed agenda, said Gold. "We have a youth advisory board and we are open to suggestions. We are very open to hearing from people. We believe that kindness is giving people what they need."

After the recent bombing at a Tel Aviv discotheque, a group of teens visited the victims, she said. "We had them collect jewellery to bring to the hospital, and we put together a concert to entertain them.

"We never know what people are really feeling but we are hoping to make them feel a little bit better – to make a dent."

One teen, said Gold, was a volunteer at a Kids for Kids event one week, and was in a bombing the next week. "One day she was passing out bagels to other kids, and a few days later she was hospitalized. We never know what will be."

It is important for children around the world to know that what is going on in Israel is real, said Gold. "It is not a TV program. These are real children very much like them, and they are suffering. It is uplifting for children to see that others care."

National Conference of Synagogue Youth (NCSY) has sponsored an essay contest in Israel, said Gold, and the winners will come here and be a guest at a regional Shabbaton. "Children will see their counterparts; they will meet real human beings."

When people hear about something happening in Israel, they "are truly concerned and really do want to help. Kids for Kids gives them that opportunity.

"There is no political solution to the situation, but if we all share, feel each others' pain and perform tangible acts of kindness, then we can change the situation," said Gold.

Insured Annuities - Lifetime Guarantees of 9% Plus

In today's environment of low interest rates and volatile stock markets, many investors seek more attractive and less stressful investments.

If you are at retirement age and trying to maximize spendable income from non-RRSP savings, insured annuities provide the best of both worlds - significantly higher after-tax income for life and the capital guaranteed tax-free to your estate. The older you are, the higher the yield on your investment.

Consider the following example, which compares the investment of $200,000 in a GIC at 5% with an insured annuity, for a man aged 75.

GIC versus Insured Annuity

	GIC	Insured Annuity
Capital	200,000	200,000
Annual Income	10,000	23,500
Taxable Income	10,000	4,500
Tax (50%)	5,000	2,250
After Tax Income	5,000	21,250
Insurance Cost	NIL	11,250
Spendable Income	5,000	10,000
Gross Equivalent Yield	5%	10%
Estate Value	200,000	200,000
Subject to Probate	YES	NO
Guaranteed Period	5 YEARS	LIFE

Effective improved yield on investment = 100%

DVI program set for Sept. 30

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Despite the troubled times in Israel, normal services must go on, says Dr. Stanley Jacobson, Canadian chair of Dental Volunteers for Israel (DVI).

Dr. Barry Chapnick

DVI will present its annual Musical Soirée at McDonald's Headquarters on Sept. 30 at 7:30 p.m. Funds raised will provide free dental and preventive services for underprivileged children and new immigrants in Jerusalem who would not otherwise have access to regular dental care.

Ten-year-old Rebecca Brenner will be the featured guest violinist. She has performed with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra and has appeared in a series of nine concerts for students at Roy Thompson Hall.

Brenner has also been in a summer outdoor concert series on Centre Island, and she has appeared with the National Academy Orchestra in Hamilton to celebrate the Brott summer and autumn music festivals, and has played with the McGill Chamber Orchestra in Montreal.

The young violinist will make her official debut with the Toronto Symphony Orchestra in January 2002 in the Light Classics Series.

Brenner has also developed a career in acting and appears in a number of popular children's television and animation series.

Dr. Barry Chapnick, the immediate past president of International Alpha Omega Fraternity, will be honoured by DVI at the soiree. Chapnick was the fifth Canadian to serve as international president of the fraternity, which supports the work of DVI.

Violin soloist Rebecca Brenner

Chapnick, who maintains a private endodontic practice, is a lecturer and associate in dentistry at the University of Toronto's faculty of dentistry. He is also an endodontic consultant at the Mount Sinai Hospital and Humber River Regional Hospital.

He served as president of the Canadian Academy of Endodontics in 1990-91 and was dental consultant to the World Basketball Championship in 1994. He serves as a volunteer dentist for the Jewish Family and Child Services.

"Chapnick has served the Toronto community as a whole and the dental community particularly with dedication and generosity," said Jacobson, an endodontist with a private practice in Toronto.

Chapnick's support of the DVI project in Jerusalem has made a difference to the quality of life of many children, Jacobson added.

Jewish and non-Jewish dentists from 14 countries work at the DVI clinic in Jerusalem for periods for one to four weeks.

They get free apartments for their families and the families participate in trips, lectures and other activities.

Jacobson said that as a result of the unrest in Israel, there has been a drastic decrease in the number of volunteer dentists at DVI. "At this time, it is even more important for dentists to come forward to serve in the clinic."

For more information on Dental Volunteers for Israel or for tickets for the Musical Soirée, call Jacobson, 416-781-8607 or fax 416-781-6090.

סרטים שאסור לחחמיץ

בדרך כלל יוצא לנו ללכת לשלושה סרטים מאכזבים על כל סרט טוב. אז חיטה קרה חנס, ובאמצע חקיץ חצלחנו לראות ארבעה סרטים שעושים טוב, כל אחד ממדינה אחרת. אני מקווה שלפחות חלק מהם יישארו על המסכים עד שיתפרסם חטור חזה.

חיטאליה חוא סרט טיקטי בחפקח צרפתית שמספר את סיפורו של כפר קטן במרומי חחיקלית, ובמרכזו המאבק בין שני דורות של מגדלים. גם אם אתם לא אוחבים סרטים מתורגמים, חסיפור כאן כל כך חוק ומרתק, שיעשה לכם טוב בנשמה. עשר בסולם קורן.

המנדולינה של קפטן קורלי חוא סיפור אחבה בין קצין איטלקי ונערה יוונית באי קפלונית. חסרט גילה לי קטע מפלחמת חעולם חשניה שלא חיה ידוע לי. חסיפור עושה טוב כמעט לכל אחד, מה שקוראים " סרט בלי סיכון", חצילומים מדחימים. שמונה בסולמי חאישי.

The closet חוא סרט צרפתי ציתי ומצחיק על מנהל חשבונות לא יצלה שמפוטר מעבודתו אך מצליח להישאר בעבודה על ידי חצגת עצמו כחומוסקסואל, דבר שמעורר חרדות עצומות אצל חמעביד שמפחד להיות "פוליטיקאלי אינקורקט". זח אולי חסרט חכי נקוב שנעשה בעניין של פוליטיקל correctness. שמונה בסולם קורן.

ואחרון חביב, Green Fingers חוא סרט בריטי קטן על קבוצת אסירי עולם, כולם רוצחים מסוג זח או אחר שמגלים את חנגנות ואת חיופי שבגידול פרחים, וחופכים לסלבריטיס. חסרט כל כך אנגלי שאפתה ממש יכול להריח את חפרחים. תשע בסולם קורן.

כיצד לחיות מיליונר- יפורט פיינגלך

יוסף קראטר, שחקן כדורסל מחונן שמתגאה לגובה של גמל ביתני ובעל כף יד של תמנון פולקיי, חתם לפני זמן קצר על חוזה לשש שנים עם קבוצת חכדורסל של טורונטו, ועבור שיחותיו חצנועים יקבל תבחור מאח ארבעים מליון דולאר. או במלים אחרות עירית מוזמנים שיכולה לצייד חטיבת שרין בטנקים חדשים ובעודף שיישאר לבנות שכונת מגורים כולל בריכים ובוב. ואם כל זח לא די, חקאפטורס חחתימה עוד כמה שחקנים חופשיים על חוזים צנועים יחסי של תשעים מליון עבור אכטוניי דיויים, שבעים מליון לאלווין וליאמס ורק חמסכן חאכים אלינואן נאלץ להסתפק בעשרים ושמונה מליון לשלוש עונות. כמובן שחרומת חשחקנים אשר חתמו על חחוזים חצנועים תחיה אדירה. חם יכניסו את טורונטו לרשימת חערים שבחן כדורסל חוא חחליף חוגן ללחם ושעושים, ובאותה חזדמנות יצליחו לחקל על כאב אובדן חחלום חאולימפי שעלה חשמיימה בסמוג של חקיץ חאחרון. אז לסיכום אני מאחל לראפטורס חצלחה וחליפות ראשונה אחרי אלפיים שנה.

ומה שחשוב יחתר, אני מציע לכל משפחה שבמקום לשלוח את חילדים לבית ספר לרפואה או משפטים, לבנות בכסף שנחסך מגרש כדורסל קטן על מגרש חחניה או במקום בריכת שחייה, ולאלץ את חדרדקים אפילו באמצעי כפייה לשחול דרך חחישוק כמה שיותר כדורים מכל חטוחים וחזוויות חאפשריות. אני גם מתכוון לקנות מחאינקוזיציה בספרד מיטה אורטופדית ובעזרתה למנוע את צצאני עד שיגיעו לגובה של ג'יראפה בת שנה. אחרי חכל מה לא נעשה כדי להצליח בחברה קאפיטאליסטית שבה כל קשר בין חתרומה וחתמורה אפילו לא מקרי.

Nava Barak calls for action against terror

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — It's time for the leaders of the western world to unite and take immediate action against terror, terrorists, their leaders and supporters, said the wife of Israel's former prime minister, just hours after last week's devastating attack on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon.

Nava Barak, whose husband Ehud offered unprecedented concessions to the Palestinians during his term as Israeli prime minister, was the keynote speaker at last week's Lion of Judah luncheon, sponsored by UJA Federation of Greater Toronto's Women's Campaign & Advocacy. The gold Lion of Judah pin has been presented to 336 Toronto women who make contributions of at least $5,000 to the annual UJA Federation campaign.

One hundred and sixty women were expected for the luncheon, held at the elegantly restored Liberty Grand (formerly the CNE's Horticultural Building), but at least three tables were empty.

On hearing of the devastation wrought by hijacked American airplanes, Jill Reitman, a former president of Jewish Women's Federation (a precursor of Women's Campaign and Advocacy) considered not going to the luncheon. "It was touch and go for me," she said. "I feel we're all in jeopardy." But ultimately she felt a sense of responsibility to attend, and said she wanted "that sense of solidarity, the feeling of togetherness."

Nava Barak

Barak echoed that sentiment, saying, "My heart – our heart – is with all those people who lost their lives or were wounded in this murderous terrorist attack."

Nothing will be the same again, she said.

"It's not only Israelis and Palestinians today. Today it's the terrorists and the rest of the world, and today, Tuesday, Sept. 11, 2001, we all woke up to a new reality."

Barak had arrived in Toronto the previous night, before airports across North America were shut down as a result of Tuesday morning's tragedy. Following her appearance in Toronto, she was driven to Montreal where she spoke the following night at another Lion of Judah event.

As a mother of three daughters and a soon-to-be grandmother, Barak said she's found herself wondering what kind of world her grandchild would grow up in.

Barak, who lives in the border town of Kochav Yair, said that to her great sorrow, not even her closest friends hide their fear of coming to visit.

But "even Tel Aviv, Jerusalem, Haifa and, today, New York and Washington, have become virtual battlefronts. The cellular phone is always turned on to check if all our friends and dear ones are safe and sound. Even if we go into town to buy something, our eyes are always moving, making sure there are no suspicious objects nearby."

"I come from a land that dreams of peace," said Barak, "and with great disappointment sees that peace being shattered."

Three days before last year's outbreak of the ongoing violence in which almost 200 Israelis have lost their lives, PA Chairman Yasser Arafat was a dinner guest in Barak's home, along with his leadership team and the Israeli peace delegation, she said.

"He spoke privately with my husband in the garden, he ate my food, and both of them were talking about responsibility of leaders in the region towards their people."

Now more than ever, Israel needs the moral support and influence of Diaspora Jewry, Barak said. "Diaspora Jewry strengthens Israel, for we are part of one extended entity."

Lesley Binstock Offman, Women's Campaign & Advocacy Chair, voiced her own message of solidarity. "Our partnership with Israel is a partnership without a cancellation clause," she said.

Barak noted the importance of UJA contributions in bolstering aliyah and social programs. As president of ELEM – Youth Distress in Israel, Barak is particularly conscious of those needs.

In Toronto, Campaign 2002 – known as Israel Now and Forever – has established a challenge fund in response to Israeli government cutbacks of $700 million (diverting funding from social services to security-related ministries). The fund will match pledge increases dollar for dollar.

Michael Bregman, co-chair with David Koschitzky of Campaign 2002, announced that more than $2 million had already been raised during the Super Sunday/Super Week telethon, which had not yet concluded. Contributions were up 20 percent card for card, he added.

Barak expressed her hope to see members of the audience in Israel "sending a message to the world that we stand proud and united."

She also asked her listeners to consider themselves "soldiers in the front lines of the battle for hearts and minds… Get out the word about what is really happening. In many ways you can have more of an effect locally than we can from far away."

Even in these difficult times, she said, "we have not lost hope. The path leading to our dreams is less certain. Peace is the only way."

A Focus on Israel

Israel — The Challenge From Within
The Harry Posen Memorial Lecture
Shira Herzog, Vice President, Kahanoff Foundation
Wednesdays, 7.30 p.m., Apr. 10, 17, 24, May 1 and 8
Israel is generally seen from the perspective of political issues, specifically its relations with Arab countries and the Palestinians. Even within the Jewish community, there's rarely the opportunity for in-depth study and discussion of domestic, quality-of-life issues. Ironically, for most Israelis, these social issues have the greatest impact on their daily lives. Moreover, how Israelis deal with these issues will determine the ethical under-pinnings of their existence, as much — if not more so — as the future of the peace process (or lack thereof). Over five evenings, using film and background reading, participants will be exposed to: the role of the military in Israel; "the stranger in our midst"— challenges of multiculturalism in a Jewish and democratic state; and the role of the voices of moderation and bridge building.

For Zion's Sake: Songs of Israel's Pioneers
Naomi Bell
Thursdays, 7.30 p.m., Apr. 11 to May 2
In this course, participants will learn the songs of Israel's pioneers within their historical context. Themes will include Chibat Tsiyon — longing for the homeland; Aliyah — going up to the land; Avodah — the ethos of labour; Adamah — the beautiful landscape; and Chalutzim — the personality of the settlers.

Other Spring 2002 Courses

Reading the Rav
Rabbi John Moscowitz

Celebrating Shabbat at Home
Rabbi Jason Rosenberg

Peace process in a 'deep coma': Rabin-Pelossof

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Like a doctor assessing the status of a critically ill patient, Israel's deputy minister of defence said she believes the peace process is "in a deep coma."

The wry comment was Dalia Rabin-Pelossof's sole attempt at humour – albeit dark – in a phone interview last week from her Tel Aviv office.

The fiftyish member of Knesset, an attorney by profession, was speaking on Monday, a day before the terror attack on New York and Washington. She was scheduled to speak at the Sept. 23 solidarity rally for Israel to be held at Queen's Park, but the event has been postponed because of the tragedy.

Dalia Rabin-Pelossof

The daughter of former Israeli prime minister Yitzhak Rabin recalled being "full of hope and belief" in the early days of the Middle East peace process, before her father was slain in 1995.

"Look what happened," she said quietly.

Yet despite the tensions in Israel and the proliferation of Palestinian suicide bombings, Rabin-Pelossof sounded composed and low-key, her comments reflective and articulate.

Although she admitted to a sense of betrayal regarding PA Chairman Yasser Arafat, she still refuses to believe that he misled her father from the beginning, she said.

"My father was a very realistic politician... My father gave his life because of this peace process. I wouldn't like to think my father's sacrifice was in vain."

Arafat's a "tough, problematic partner'

Arafat is still a peace partner, she said, but he's a "tough, problematic partner, because he doesn't show any signs of goodwill to sit and talk, and we know he's orchestrating all the terror movements. He's behind everything that's happening. As our enemy, he is our partner too."

The current situation in Israel "seems depressing and hopeless," said Rabin-Pelossof. "For me personally it's very difficult."

In her opinion, it's "worse than a war, because the whole country is the front. Almost everywhere is a potential place to be hit by suicide attacks."

Israel is trying its best to "take every measure possible for self-defence, without – as much as possible – hurting Palestinian civilians."

Ultimately, however, she believes the answer lies in negotiation and a peace accord. "I don't think in the battlefield we can solve this problem. We have to have separation, and a Palestinian state, and I don't see this happening without negotiations."

The support of Jews here is "very important nowadays."

It's also important, she said, for the community here to know "that we hold on, that we are still strong, that we believe that we are right, and that we still believe that finally peace will come."

Today, nowhere in Israel is safe, she said. "But we live here and go on with our everyday life. It's important to see that life goes on."

Files on alleged Nazi war criminals increase

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Canada does not go after every person who lied 50 years ago in order to get into the country, says the director and senior counsel, crimes against humanity and war crimes section, Department of Justice.

"We only go after those people who we say were war criminals," Terry Beitner said at a recent regional executive meeting of Canadian Jewish Congress, Ontario region. It was CJC's first meeting of the new administration.

When a case comes before the courts, Beitner said, "we are not asking the judge to say this person is a war criminal; that is not the question. The question is whether the person lied to gain admission to Canada.

"When the court determines that the person lied, the matter is handed back to the minister of citizenship and immigration who is permitted to go to cabinet and ask them to strip that person of his citizenship. After cabinet revokes citizenship, there is a process of judicial review."

Beitner, who has been with the unit since last year, said his unit was formed after Jules Deschenes, who in the mid-'80s led a commission into the prosecution of Nazi war criminals, submitted a list of 883 names to the government.

"Out of those, Deschenes told us to prioritize about 20 cases because with the other [over] 800 cases we could be wasting 20 years and not looking at the cases we should be," said Beitner.

When Beitner makes an allegation, he said, "I have to have a standard. When is a guy a war criminal? Is he a criminal if he drove a tank through a village?

"We look at those individuals – given the life of the target and our resources, which are sufficient – where we can find some kind of criminal responsibility. [I need] evidence from a policy perspective."

Since 1986 when the unit was given the 883 cases, said Beitner, it has examined 1,600 files. "We get new allegations all the time; there has to be a mechanism to make these decisions."

As the current height of activity diminished in the courts, he said, he has been able to commit resources to send lawyers overseas to interview witnesses, and commit historians to wrap up their investigations. "We'll see the fruits of those efforts shortly."

Also at the meeting, Bernie Farber, executive director, CJC, Ontario region, said that in the case of Helmut Oberlander, who was recently stripped of his citizenship, "I wish we could say that the case is over.

"There will be a judicial review by the Federal Court of Appeals on the cabinet decision, and that decision can be appealed to the Supreme Court of Canada. Potentially, he can be here another two or three years before the case is dealt with," said Farber.

He added that Steven Rambam, a Nazi hunter, had located Joseph Kisielaitis, a member of the Lithuanian police unit, in Montreal. Kisielaitis had lived in the United States, and then moved to Burlington, but left after a demonstration was staged in front of his home. Rambam had planned a public meeting in Montreal exposing the fact that Kisielaitis is now there, said Farber.

In other business, Ed Morgan, chair, CJC Ontario region, said that there has been a lot of activity regarding the Ontario tax credit for parents who send their children to private schools.

Within five years, said Morgan, the credit should increase so that parents receive $3,500 or about 50 percent of the average school tuition. Negotiations between Hebrew day schools and Christian schools, and the Ministry of Finance are planned, he said, to ensure that parents get the full advantage of the tax credit.

"We have to make sure the benefits are maximized," said Morgan.

Hypocrisy and ignorance

The spectacularly sickening acts of terror last Tuesday were rebroadcast countless times on every network. After awhile though, most of us had to avert our eyes, as a small personal gesture of humanity, and in acknowledgment of the fact that the scenes being played over and over again were neither computer animated, nor examples of video-game violence.

Rather, they were scenes of real deaths, terrifying and horrible.

Denial quickly gave way to anger, and anger to a searing desire for justice.

Somewhat surprisingly, even as the debris continued to fall at the World Trade Center, less than 48 hours after the monstrous acts of terror, some of our pundits were already corrupting Justice's scales, finding excuses and justifications for the attack.

From the editor's desk

The analysis followed upon a variation of this general theme:

Only people with enormous hatred towards the United States, these experts correctly proclaimed, could be capable of committing such atrocities.

And what would inspire such hatred, they logically asked next. America's foreign policy, was the quick reply.

And what specifically about America's foreign policy spawned such hatred, came the disingenuous, next question. Its support for Israel!!!

The most blatant attempts to deflect blame from the terrorists came from some of the reporters of the BBC. But a report last Wednesday by CBC reporter Carol Off was not far behind.

It was a short five to seven minute report in which only anti-Israel opinions were expressed. Not even one countervailing opinion was heard.

"America is reaping the harvest it has sown in its foreign policy," opined one young man. Expert in nothing but his own ignorance, he offered the following observation: "There are daily situations [in the West Bank and Gaza] in which dozens of mothers and children are being killed by M16s and airplanes [provided to Israel by the United States]."

This grotesquely false statement was left unchallenged, "on the record" as it were, a deeply disturbing thought, hanging in the acrid air like a sharp, dangerous knife pointed at Israel.

The viewer was essentially told by the reporter that the midwife who gave birth to the hatred of the United States is a three-headed monster consisting of pro-Israel foreign policy, "the much-loathed policy of sanctions against Iraq" and, of late, "the walking out of the Durban conference [by the United States] in support of Israel."

Variations of the same argument also appeared in the print media.

The nub of the argument always boiled down to this: that the creation of the State of Israel displaced some 700,000 Palestinians from their lands. They remain displaced and without their own homeland even today. The despair wrought by this displacement has not abated over the past five decades; indeed, it has evolved into an unslakable thirst for justice from the Jews, who after all, are a non-indigenous colonial outpost in the Muslim Middle East.

But the argument, both at its nub and along it periphery, is perniciously false. In its most benign form, it is shallow, specious and tendentious; at its worst, it is hypocritical, ignorant and malevolent.

Thankfully, a number of political commentators, such as Marcus Gee in the Globe and Mail and Norman Doidge in the National Post, had the courage to refute the arguments.

In last Saturday's Globe, Gee wrote, "Terrorism is a deliberate form of political or ideological warfare waged by fanatics with a disposition for unlimited violence... Addressing 'root causes' will not stop people like that. Even if Israel pulled out of the West Bank tomorrow, Islamic terrorist groups would keep trying to kill Israel. To them, it is not the Israeli occupation that rankles. It is the very existence of Israel. It is pure hatred, more than grievance, that drives them."

Even the enormous atrocities of last week have not eliminated the absurdity and surrealism of the manner in which Israel is treated by the nations of the world.

There was the example last Friday of the offensive statement by the French ambassador to Israel that the terror committed against Israel was not comparable to that committed against the United States. He was not referring to quantitative measurements but rather to qualitative ones, as if the slaughter of innocents at the Dolphinarium discotheque or at the Sbarro pizzeria was a lesser grief for its mourners than for the mourners at the World Trade Center.

An ominous and eerie replaying of the coalition of 1990-91 against Saddam Hussein also appears to be taking shape. Arab states object to Israel joining the American-sponsored and American-led coalition against terrorism.

And in the absurdities of all absurdities, U.S. Secretary of State Colin Powell hinted Sunday that the condemnations by Iran and Syria of the Tuesday attacks in New York and Washington could open the door to cooperation with them too.

There is a creeping sense that some officials in the American administration may attempt to differentiate the terror suffered by the United States from the terror constantly aimed at Israel.

If that is indeed the case, what lesson will those officials have learned from the terror that struck America last Tuesday?

One Glen Park is "house in condo's clothing"

Not long ago, President David Feldman and his team at Camrost-Felcorp decided to create a new development that would embody everything a condo, in a perfect world, could and should be. This project — One Glen Park — is part of Camrost-Felcorp's exclusive, elegant Signature Collection of condominium residences.

This jewel of a condo, set among million-dollar single-family homes in the Bathurst-Glencairn area, represents the fruition of an ambitious goal: to create a detached home environment in condominium form. Indeed, says Community Sales Manager Barbara Klein, you could call these residences "houses in condo's clothing".

As you move out of a house and into a condo, you'll want convenience: simple, uncomplicated living, without the tsuris of maintaining a house and yard. You'll want the lifestyle that lets you devote your time and energy to the things you've yearned to do for decades.

One Glen Park offers you this, and a great deal more. Like living in a friendly area where you know your neighbours. Like enjoying all the advantages and convenience of the condominium lifestyle while remaining connected to all your old haunts. Like being within walking distance of shuls and shopping, family and friends.

There are just over 45 condominium residences in the building. You might call this seven-storey building a medium rise; Ms. Klein refers to it as a "baby rise". There are a variety of designs available. The seventh floor has four penthouses, for example; each boasts a terrace as large as some entire condominiums!

Ushering in the New Year with a new home

Not only have One Glen Park's builders maintained the standards of fine design and craftsmanship that go with gracious living, each resident's needs will receive special consideration. This is not just a condominium, it's your home, and Barbara will be happy to spend as much time as necessary to ensure that it fulfills that vision.

The porte cochère provides a grand entrance for you, your guests, friends, and family. It is complemented by a distinguished, richly appointed lobby with a gracious, warmly welcoming fireplace.

Each condominium unit has a nine-foot ceiling, and there are pot lights in the kitchens and bathrooms. Brightness and generous spaces are the rule here.

There are five high-end appliances, and the kitchens have granite counters with undermount sinks. Whether you wish to enjoy a casual meal, or display your culinary flair at a dinner party, One Glen Park will let you prove to your guests what they already know: that those hotshot TV chefs have nothing on you!

Speaking of guests, these residences are spacious enough that if you feel like having 20 people for Shabbos dinner, there's ample room.

Your every comfort is provided for. You control your own individual heating and cooling. Some ensuite bathrooms even have whirlpools, double vanities, separate showers, and marble tile floors.

Want to keep in sync with the world around you? Every condo has a high-speed Rogers Wave link, so you can surf the Web at your leisure.

There are an abundance of facilities for you and your visitors: two guest suites, a party room, and a kitchenette for catering. Thinking about athletics, or a healthy, physically active lifestyle? You'll find a steam room, a fitness centre, even a wave pool for aspiring Olympians.

Prices at One Glen Park range from $286,800 to $980,000. And with just over 45 suites in the building, you're advised to act soon to ensure you get the floor, suite and design you want.

What better way to usher in the New Year than with a new home — and what better way of saying "Shana Tova" to yourself?

Events cancelled in Montreal

By JANICE ARNOLD
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — A number of events were cancelled last week in the wake of the terrorist attacks in the United States, including an outdoor vigil for the attacks' victims organized by the Hillel Jewish student organization, after police advised against it.

Attack on US

Security was heightened at Jewish institutions and there were reports of many parents taking their children out of Jewish schools on the day of the attacks, but things returned to near normal the following day.

The Montreal Jewish Community Security Co-ordinating Group, a permanent body co-chaired by Canadian Jewish Congress, Quebec Region and B'nai Brith Canada, reassured the community that the Montreal Urban Community police have no evidence that there is any threat at present.

However, Jewish institutions will continue to be under enhanced surveillance by police "as a precaution."

Rabbi Reuven Poupko, the group's spokesperson, said he was pleased that the police acted immediately after the attacks, touring all Jewish institutions to verify their security. Extra measures were already in place since the conflict in Israel and with the approach of the High Holidays, he said.

However, he advised against overreaction.

"There is no reason to pull children out of school or to stay away from synagogues. The community has received no threat of any kind and there is no reason any institution should be a target. Terrorism is also a psychological assault. We have to continue to live normally, or the terrorists are winners," he said.

No major Jewish organization closed last week.

"We felt it was very important to stay open and continue as normally as possible," said FEDERATION CJA communications director Marian Levy.

She admits, however, that the day of the attacks was "a write-off" with staff having difficulty focusing on anything but the horrifying news. Televisions tuned to CNN were kept going in the boardroom and staff were free to keep up with what was going on, she said.

The Hillel event was scheduled for Sept. 13 at noon outside the McGill Student Union building on McTavish Street. It was originally intended to be a pro-Israel rally to be held two days before what was expected to be a massive march denouncing Israel by Palestinian groups and their sympathizers. That Sept. 15 march, planned months in advance by the student group Solidarity for Palestinian Human Rights (SPHR) and expected to draw upwards of 15,000 persons from North America, was also cancelled.

An SPHR spokesperson told the media that it did so because it would not be "appropriate" at this time and also out of fear of reprisals against Arabs and Muslims.

Hillel executive director Simon Bensimon said after the attacks it was decided to change the Israel event into a solemn commemoration for those who died last Tuesday. However, police told Hillel that "they would rather not see any public demonstrations by either side" in the Mideast conflict, Bensimon said.

Last weekend, Chabad Lubavitch held what it called The Torah Peace Accord, "a Jewish response to hatred and terrorism" – a 24-hour study vigil with different rabbis speaking on a range of topical Jewish issues.

"The Jewish response is to reaffirm our commitment to our 4,000-year-old Jewish heritage," said Chabad's Rabbi Ronnie Fine. "Through the study of Torah, camaraderie and solidarity, we can bring ultimate peace closer to the entire world."

There were spontaneous acts of kindness. Rabbi Saul Emanuel, director of the Vaad Hair, immediately upon hearing that incoming flights to the United States were being diverted to Canadian airports, arranged for kosher food to be available to any stranded Jews requiring it.

Working with the chassidic Tash community in Boisbriand, which is relatively close to Mirabel, the Vaad set up a system to deliver prepared kosher meals to the airport. In the two days following the attacks, 35 meals had been delivered.

Rabbi Emanuel also sent notice to every hotel in the city and notified Cara, the food supplier to many airlines, that the Vaad stood ready to supply any kosher food needed. He also set up a hot line for anyone in transit who had needed assistance from the Jewish community, such as accommodation.

"We had plenty of people calling us saying they would open their homes. It was absolutely amazing," he said.

Hatzolah, the volunteer emergency medical service, offered its free services to any organization or institution following the attacks. Hatzolah, which operates round the clock, seven days a week, has over 40 trained emergency medical workers.

The hyper-vigilance in the community was evident elsewhere. On the day of the attack, the huge Shaar Hashomayim synagogue was evacuated for awhile. The office of the executive director explained that guards' suspicions had been aroused when they noticed someone park in front of the synagogue, then drive away in another car. Fortunately, there was a plausible explanation and the synagogue re-opened.

Community on security alert following attacks

"Police in all communities in these situations put Jewish community institutions under special watch… Our approach across the country has been that institutions and people should carry on with their activities in a normal fashion, while they implement this high level of security."

Toronto police have assured Congress that "Jewish community institutions will be paid special attention over the next short while," Farber said.

Although high profile American institutions in New York and Washington were targeted, such attacks can inspire others to attack Jewish targets, said Rubin Friedman, a spokesperson for Congress' national office in Ottawa.

He noted that in the months after the Palestinian intifadah erupted in Israel, Canadian Jews were assaulted and synagogues were firebombed. "These things have happened here in Canada. We can't take these things for granted," he said.

B'nai Brith Canada called on security and immigration authorities to be on the alert in light of the planned entry into Canada of thousands of pro-Palestinian demonstrator for a Sept.15 rally in Montreal. Some demonstrators might be linked to groups that support terrorism, B'nai Brith warned.

The terrorist atrocities prompted stepped-up security measures across the country. The RCMP increased its presence around the U.S. and Israeli embassies.

In Israel, the Foreign Ministry issued directives to its diplomatic missions in the United States to evacuate most of its staff. The ministry also asked employees of Israeli foreign offices and Jewish organizations to be vigilant. On Tuesday, the embassy in Ottawa remained in operation, but with a skeleton staff.

Fallout from the attacks led to the cancellation of numerous community events. In New York, the United Jewish Communities (UJC) announced it would not hold an Israel Now and Forever Solidarity Rally scheduled for midtown Manhattan on Sept. 23. The Jewish Community of Ottawa followed suit, postponing a solidarity rally scheduled for the same day. Communities in Toronto, Montreal, Winnipeg, Edmonton and Calgary later announced they too were postponing their solidarity rallies. Farber said a new date for the Toronto rally will be discussed after the High Holy Days.

"The rally was going to be part of a co-ordinated expression of the world Jewish community's support for Israel. While our strong support for Israel is unwavering, the leadership of the Jewish Community of Ottawa has decided that as a matter of respect, it would be inappropriate to proceed with the rally at this time," a community news release stated.

Meanwhile, UJA Federation of Greater Toronto announced it was establishing a relief fund to provide financial support to organizations in New York that are assisting victims of the attacks. For more information, call 416-631-5705 or send a cheque, made out to UJA New York Relief Fund, to 4600 Bathurst St., Toronto, M2R 3V2.

The federation also called on large shuls to ask their members to billet some of the people stranded in Toronto when their flights were cancelled. The Federation-funded Jewish Information Service also opened a registry for stranded passengers who needed food and lodging.

In other developments, a tribute dinner one year in the making was cancelled only hours before it was scheduled to commence.

The dinner, in honour of cardiovascular surgeon Dr. Tirone David, was jointly sponsored by the Toronto General & Western Hospital Foundation and the Canadian Shaare Zedek Hospital Foundation.

Two thousand guests were expected at the dinner, which was to be held on Tuesday evening on the playing field in SkyDome.

A conference of legal experts on the proposed International Criminal Court, jointly planned by the Osgoode Hall law school and the Simon Wiesenthal Centre, was also cancelled.

And in Toronto, the Jewish Education Program and the National Conference of Synagogue Youth jointly sponsored a Tehillim (Psalms) and Chizuk gathering last Saturday night to pray for the victims of the terrorist attacks.

With tens of thousands of people working in New York's World Trade Center towers, and with a large Jewish population in the city, no doubt many of the victims were Jewish.

In Markham, a community just north of Toronto, the family of Edmund Glazer, sat shivah for their son, who was killed in the terrorist attacks.

Glazer, 41, the son of Norman and Lily Glazer, was a passenger on American Airlines Flight 11, one of the planes that crashed into the World Trade Center. Glazer lived in Los Angeles and was chief financial officer of MRV Communications.

Congress meeting in Halifax

By JOEL JACOBSON
Atlantic Correspondent

HALIFAX — Two Hampton, N.B. lawyers were honoured by Canadian Jewish Congress and the Atlantic Jewish Council recently for their efforts in winning an appeal for newspaper cartoonist Josh Beutel against Holocaust denier and former teacher Malcolm Ross.

David and Brenda Lutz were recognized at a Congress national officers' meeting in Halifax, the first time such a meeting was held in Atlantic Canada.

"It was the most trying case of our careers," David Lutz said. "It went on for six years, from the time in 1995 when Beutel was served [with documents alleging] libel until the appeal decision came down last May."

Beutel, an editorial page cartoonist with the (New Brunswick) Telegraph-Journal, had caricatured Ross as a Nazi following Ross' conviction on illegally using his Moncton, N.B. classroom to foment anti-Semitism. A judge hearing the original defamation case ruled in favour of Ross but the three-member New Brunswick Court of Appeal overthrew that verdict 3-0.

"Lutz is a real mensch," said Tom Kuttner, Fredericton, a lawyer and professor at University of New Brunswick, involved with many of AJC's anti-racism and anti-Semitism efforts.

"He did all his work pro bono and didn't even ask for expenses. He did a three-week trial before the first judge after doing many hours of preparation and, with Brenda writing the appellant brief, reviewed 4,500 pages of transcript."

Kuttner said he looked for someone in the Jewish community to do the work "but Lutz had asked to help with the Ross case several years before and I went to him with this one. He readily agreed."

Lutz said this "was the most important thing I've done since I became a lawyer. Hopefully I don't have to do anything this important again."

Beutel said the March 2001 decision and the passage of the Sept. 1 deadline for Ross to counter appeal (he didn't) lifted a heavy burden from his shoulders. Still working with the New Brunswick newspaper on a contract basis, Beutel said the final outcome "means nothing practically in my role as a cartoonist with a small 'c' conservative newspaper. But the implications are important to newspapers, cartoonists and journalists."

A low profile, the best profile

One would think that with Parliament returning from its long recess following a summer of political intrigue and partisan flip-flops, all attention would be focused on the drama of Question Period and the like.

Not surprisingly, however, the interest of those who call the Hill "home" is still riveted on developments south of the border. In speaking to politicians and senior staffers, it is clear that many of their thoughts and observations turn to Israel.

The next period of time will be trying for the Jewish community for three reasons in particular. Managing them will do much to keep attention in the political sector focused where it should be – on the challenge of confronting terrorism – a phenomenon not unfamiliar to Jews and Israel.

First is the spin being advanced by the Arab and Palestinian community. They have some daunting challenges of their own and it is to be expected that in trying to deal with them, attempts will be made to direct attention toward Israel in two ways. First, Israel will be identified as the source of state-sponsored terrorism against Palestinians (in order to imply a shared experience with the American victims). We have also heard people justifying the gleeful (there is, unfortunately no other word to describe it) reactions among some Palestinians to the atrocity in New York as the natural result of a traumatized people reacting to a blow suffered by the perceived sponsor of their oppressors.

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

Second is the sentiment, finding expression in some quarters, that America brought this on itself because of its pro-Israel Middle East policies.

Finally, there are suggestions by those who are less than friendly to Israel that Jews and other supporters of Israel will now, inappropriately, proclaim: "See? This is what we have been talking about." We have already heard commentary from some of the electronic media that many Israelis are, in effect, secretly pleased that the United States finally can understand the ordeal with which Israel routinely contends.

Jews who are typically on the losing end of Middle East PR battles will find this difficult to believe, but this battle can be won if the community follows one deceptively simple piece of advice: say nothing!

If the civilized world is determined to finally confront terrorists and those who support them, there is no room for deflecting attention from this objective. We haven't come across any thinking person who has bought into this spin "trifecta," and engaging in a rebuttal will only give it a credibility that it doesn't currently have.

So maintain a low profile and allow others to come to the conclusions that have been well understood within the Jewish community for a long time. From this misery may yet come some good.

As Canadian Jewry celebrate the Jewish New Year, we add our hopes that it is one characterized by peace and tranquility.

Israelis need help urgently: ICMC

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Never have the services of the Israel Crisis Management Centre (ICMC) been more in demand than in recent months. With the escalation of violence and suicide bombings becoming more and more frequent, victims and their families are in urgent need of help.

The Israel Crisis Management Centre's founder and director, Ruth Bar- On, described the centre's work at the recent launch of Ottawa's United Jewish Appeal, speaking of the people whose lives have been forever altered by random acts of terror.

"We are a network of volunteers that is helping immigrants who are the most vulnerable segment of Israeli society, to support and accompany them the same way as family and friends help and support each other," Bar-On said.

"The support is immediate, but it is also long term. There are many small things that can be done for a person in distress. There are also many things that cannot be done. You cannot undo what has been done by fate; what we can do is make things a bit easier for the family, make the unbearable a bit more bearable.

"When it is not a news item anymore, when it is forgotten, when the next news item eclipses the last, the needs of the families remain."

Many of the victims have been new immigrants, without family support networks in Israel. For them, the Israel Crisis Management Centre is a lifeline.

A former new immigrant from the Ukraine who was helped by the Israel Crisis Management Centre and is now a volunteer there, Anna Krakovich had 70 percent of her body burned in a car bombing just two years after arriving in Israel. She also spoke at the event.

"I was on my way home from the high school where I worked as a teacher, in Afula, on my way home to Haifa where I lived with my daughter of ten," she said.

The bomb blew up right beside her; eight victims were killed on the spot. When Krakovich awoke in Rambam Hospital in Haifa, Bar-On was by her bedside and from that day on, volunteers visited and helped her and her ten-year-old daughter back to life.

"[My daughter] Irene has grown up a very happy person because she was not left alone when she most needed it," said Krakovich.

"When I stopped functioning as a mother, she was only ten years old and if it were not for the volunteers, she would have been helpless. She is now in the army. This adds to my feeling of belonging in Israel but for her, it is just a part of growing up there."

Krakovich has been a volunteer with the centre for the past seven years.

The opening event, organized by Bonnie Merovitz, featured the Ottawa Shira Choir, under the direction of Cantor Daniel Benlolo and two recent participants in the Birthright Israel, Bonnie Cohen and Jascha Jabes, who discussed how the trip increased their commitment both to Israel and to their own local Jewish community.

This year's chair of the UJA General Campaign, Chuck Merovitz, and of the Women's Campaign, Rhoda Levitan, urged community members to think of the sacrifices being made by the people of Israel and to contribute wholeheartedly to the campaign.

After racism forum, potential African-Arab rift

By TIM PULMAN
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

The strains that have emerged between African countries and Arab nations following the UN World Conference Against Racism are creating a potential rift that could benefit Israel.

Many African countries are angry with the Arab bloc for nearly ruining the racism conference. The conference ended Sept. 8 with a compromise on the Mideast conflict that deleted the harshest attacks on Israel, but only after a last-minute attempt by Syria and Pakistan to restore tough anti-Israeli language was defeated on a procedural vote.

"It's become obvious that the Arabs were hellbent on forcing through the agenda against Israel, even if it meant wrecking Africa's vital objectives at the conference," complained a key South African conference figure, who requested anonymity. "This is bound to affect the way we view those we thought were our brothers."

Pressure from Arab countries, in the form of steep oil price increases

The main focus of African delegates was to condemn slavery and colonialism, extract an apology for the slave trade, and win promises of development aid and trade concessions.

The final declaration addressed those issues only in watered-down form.

The South Africans feel betrayed because, they claim, they were vital in helping the Palestinians to find acceptable compromise language after the American and Israeli delegations stalked out of the conference, and France threatened to follow suit.

"If we had not worked so hard to convince the Europeans, there would have been not a single word about the Middle East in the final declaration," a conference source stated.

"This is how they repay us," another South African source said. "The Arabs wanted to have their cake and eat it."

It's still too early to tell if or how African countries might change their policies toward Israel in light of the anti-racism conference, but analysts see several potential benefits for Israel:

- Reluctance on the part of African states to agree to harsh criticism of Israel in future UN General Assembly and Security Council declarations;
- Exploration of trade and aid deals with Israel, especially in agriculture, technology and use of appropriate computer and Internet technology;
- Willingness by African states to speak out against the continued use of slaves and slave-like workers in Mauritania, Sudan and some Gulf States;
- Less focus on Israel as the primary human rights violator in the Middle East, with more mention made of the plight of the Kurds and other minorities in Arab states.

"We have always seen ourselves as backers of the Palestinian cause," a senior South African source said. "But now we are wondering what we are getting in return."

Other African representatives have been even more scathing. They recall that Israel provided significant aid, especially in agriculture, to several African states prior to the Yom Kippur War.

Pressure from Arab countries, in the form of steep oil price increases, led most African states to break off ties with Israel soon after that 1973 war.

"We did not get really preferential oil prices, and we wonder what the Arabs have actually done for us black Africans," said one senior African commentator who attended the conference.

The commentator pointed out that two anti-black riots have exploded in the Arab countries of North Africa in the past year, resulting in loss of life. Africans also say they feel discriminated against when seeking work or studying in Arab countries, especially in Persian Gulf states.

The feeling is growing, the commentator said, that Africans are being used as "pawns" by Arab nations whose sole agenda is the Israeli-Palestinian conflict, and are not interested in promoting African interests.

The terrorist attacks on the United States last week have added another worry – that Africa may be drawn into extremist violence stemming from the Mideast conflict.

Africans are already smarting from the 1998 bombings of the U.S. embassies in Nairobi, Kenya and in Dar es Salaam, Tanzania. More than 200 Africans died in the attacks – attributed to Osama Bin Laden's militant Muslim group – along with a handful of Americans.

The South African regime is considered unlikely to abandon the Palestinian cause. However, it is expected to become much more suspicious of potential Islamic terrorism in its own cities following a spate of bomb attacks in Cape Town.

The bombings have abated in recent months, but authorities have attributed the attacks to Islamic hardliners among the city's Malay population.

Many leaders in South Africa's ruling African National Congress continue to feel an affinity with self-described national liberation movements such as the PLO. Anti-American sentiment also is common, as many here feel that the United States did little to bring down South Africa's old apartheid regime.

In addition, after their success in "saving" the recent racism conference over the Mideast issue, South African leaders hope to play a role in mediating any future Mideast peace talks.

Few expect a sudden turnaround in South African politics – but the seeds have now been sown for a more even-handed approach to the Middle East conflict.

'Terrorism' re-enters CBC lexicon

It is unfortunate that it takes a catastrophe on the order of the terrorist attacks on the United States last week to make some people, including some journalists, finally accept, in blunt terms, the reality Israelis have been contending with on a daily basis, year after year.

According to Reports

To take a prominent example, the CBC's Middle East correspondent, Neil Macdonald, had maintained a policy of not using the term "terrorist" when describing even suicide bombings against Israeli civilians. He apparently held the view that the CBC never uses the term "terrorist," favouring in all cases "militant" or "extremist."

That is not so. A quick check of CBC reports, both radio and TV, around the time of the trial of Ahmed Ressam, revealed the frequent use of the supposedly forbidden term. (Ressam was convicted in early April of nine criminal charges including conspiracy to commit terrorism for his part in a December 1999 plan to blow up the Los Angeles airport.)

The use of the terms "terrorism" and "terrorist" when properly applied to situations in which the perpetrators specifically target civilians to advance political/military goals is natural. To apply those terms to conflicts around the globe with the exception of Israel is not. Yet even in his reports of the horrific terrorist attacks in Tel Aviv (June 1 at the Dolphinarium disco) and in Jerusalem (August 9 at the Sbarro pizzeria), Macdonald only referred to "extremist groups" as being responsible, even though, with evident sincerity, he observed that the "slaughter of [Israeli] innocents has sickened the world."

Something started to change, however, on the morning of Sept. 11. During an interview with Macdonald about reaction in the Middle East to the attacks in the United States, CBC anchor Peter Mansbridge set the tone: "You know, people are obviously struck by a lot of different things today."

Macdonald, seemingly agreed, saying: "If there's an Arab angle to this, and suicide attacks are a hallmark of Arab terrorism, or what is considered Arab terrorism..." The direct reference to "Arab terrorism" was immediately qualified by "or what is considered." But the words had slipped out of Macdonald's mouth for the first time.

In his report for the National later that evening, Macdonald, initially holding true to form, referred to groups like Hamas and Islamic Jihad as "extremist." Yet in a follow-up reply to Mansbridge about the impact on Israel of the attack on the United States, he said: "Well, Peter, you heard the sorrow and the sympathy that were expressed by Israeli leaders today. It's genuine. But I think, at the same time, there is a sort of glimmer of grim satisfaction that the rest of the world has met Israel's enemy... And I think Israeli leaders are happy that the world will close ranks with them. I think to a certain extent that has begun. Simply the use of the word 'terrorism'... The word 'terrorism' is certainly on our style books now... And I think that is the start of the world's perception, perhaps, growing a little bit closer to Israel's about this sort of thing."

State Department report blasts PLO violence

By MATTHEW E. BERGER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

WASHINGTON — The State Department determined that elements of the PLO were involved in acts of violence against Israel during the past year, and that Palestinian leaders did not attempt to prevent these attacks.

However, the department did not find conclusive evidence that the leaders were involved in planning or approving violence toward Israelis.

The information is contained in the semi-annual PLO Commitments Compliance Report, released to Congress last Wednesday.

The report examined the period from Dec. 16, 2000 to June 15, 2001. It found that the Tanzim – the militia of Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's Fatah movement – and Arafat's elite presidential guard, Force 17, were involved in terror.

The timing of the release, just a day after the most murderous terrorist attacks in America's history, was coincidental, a State Department official said.

The report also shows that Arafat and other senior Palestinian officials made "no serious or sustained efforts" to prevent the acts "through clear instructions or to assume responsibility over their compliance" until after the suicide bombing of a Tel Aviv disco June 1.

"It is clear that Chairman Arafat and Palestinian leadership can and must do more to end violence," a State Department official said. "Without such an effort, it will be impossible to move forward with implementation" of recommendations made by an international commission led by former Sen. George Mitchell.

A spokesman for the Israeli Embassy in Washington, Mark Regev, said he sees a direct link between Arafat and the violence in the region, saying Arafat controls the security infrastructure in the West Bank and Gaza Strip and has ultimate authority over the Tanzim militias.

"We believe that Chairman Arafat has strategic control over the terror," Regev said. "He can act when he chooses to do so to end the terrorism."

The previous report – which covered the first months of the Israeli-Palestinian violence that began last September – also did not directly link Arafat to the violence, but did not specifically criticize the senior Palestinian leadership's permissive attitude toward terror.

In the past, the report has been used by lawmakers and American Jewish groups to urge the Bush administration to downgrade America's relationship with the Palestinian Authority.

Specifically, Jewish leaders want some of the Palestinian factions to be placed on the State Department's list of foreign terrorist organizations, which comes out next month.

But a State Department official said last Thursday that the report is not necessarily an indication that Palestinian groups will be added to the list.

"These are two distinct matters," he said. "We are continuing to review the list of foreign terrorist organizations."

Suggestions also include downgrading the status of the PLO's office in Washington and not allowing Arafat and other Palestinian leaders to travel freely in the United States.

The official said congressional action forcing the president to take action against the PLO would be "counterproductive."

While the report has received significant attention in the past, it is unclear how last Tuesday's terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon will affect the calls for action, given that Arafat is seen as part of the Arab bloc President George W. Bush believes he needs to court to launch an assault on terrorism.

Sept. 10

• Foreign Minister Shimon Peres announced he would meet Yasser Arafat Tuesday to discuss a cease-fire. (The meeting did not take place.)

Sept. 11

• Israel evacuated all its diplomatic missions around the world following the terror attacks in the U.S.

Sept. 12

• An Israeli woman was killed by Palestinian gunmen in a drive-by shooting near Kalkilya. (The IDF subsequently destroyed PA positions in Kalkilya and also clashed with PA forces in Jenin, killing at least three.)

• The Sbarro pizzeria, in which 15 Israelis were killed and 130 wounded earlier in the summer by a Palestinian terrorist, reopened.

Sept. 13

• The head of the Shin Bet security service, Avi Dichter, and other senior Shin Bet security service officials met with a group of rabbis to discuss scenarios that may be played out if settlements need to be evacuated.

Sept. 14

• Some 140 Israelis known to have been in the United States on Tuesday have still not made contact with their families in Israel. But most, according to the Israeli consulate in New York, were also probably nowhere near the World Trade Center at the moment it collapsed. According to the consulate, only about 30 Israelis are known to have been in the vicinity when the attack occurred.

• The Associated Press refused to release its footage of Palestinians celebrating the terror attack in the U.S. The decision stems from threats made against AP by PA security forces.

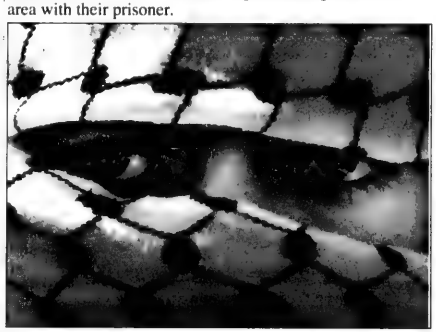
Osama Bin Laden's long reach into Israel

By AMOS HAREL
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

The incident that occured at the Rafah international crossing on June 1, 2000, did not attract much attention at first, with news giving the story only a few lines: a confrontation broke out between Israeli security guards and Palestinians as a result of the formers' insistence on arresting a young Palestinian who had crossed into Rafah from Egypt. During the ensuing clashes, 10 Palestinian policemen were injured by rubber-coated bullets fired by the Israeli soldiers, and the Shin Bet security service agents managed to leave the area with their prisoner.



Only gradually did the behind-the-scenes story begin to emerge. The incident was so serious that the head of the Palestinian security apparatus in the Gaza Strip, Mohammed Dahlan, turned it into a justification for a long-lived vendetta against the Shin Bet.

The Rafah prisoner was Nabil Ukal, a 27-year-old resident of the Jabaliya refugee camp in the Gaza Strip. The Shin Bet, just like their counterparts working for Dahlan, knew the exact reasons for insisting on holding the prisoner. Ukal was supposed to have served as a key figure and first representative in the territories of the international terrorist organization headed by the wealthy Saudi dissident Osama Bin Laden.

In October 1997, Ukal left the Gaza Strip for religious studies in Pakistan. There he joined one of the organizations affiliated with Bin Laden and underwent paramilitary training in Afghanistan. Under orders from Halil al-Dich, a senior member in the organization, Ukal was sent to the territories to set up the paramilitary infrastructure for operations in the territories. These activities were also meant to include the participation of Israeli Arabs.

Ukal returned to the Gaza Strip in 1998 and remained in contact with Bin Laden activists in Jordan and Britain, receiving instructions through electronic mail.

Upon his return to the Gaza Strip, Ukal is also known to have met with the spiritual leader of Hamas, Sheikh Ahmed Yassin, informing him of the training that he had undergone in Afghanistan. Yassin, in turn, provided Ukal with $10,000 for his activities. At the Shin Bet security service, the assessment is that Yassin was not aware that Ukal was an operative for Bin Laden.

For his part, Ukal sought to recruit Israeli Arabs. He met with two Islamic Movement activists in Umm al-Fahm, but with no success. The two were held by the Shin Bet at a later date, but were subsequently released after questioning.

When charges were brought against Ukal in the military court at the Erez Crossing in the Gaza Strip, he was indicted for planning to carry out a large-scale attack in the centre of the country, sending suicide bombers and attacking Israel Defence Forces soldiers.

While Ukal was in detention, his colleagues were busy gathering intelligence information, testing explosives and gathering explosive materials. Ten of the members of the Bin Laden cell in the territories were arrested by the Shin Bet and the Palestinian Authority during the weeks before the outbreak of the intifadah.

A senior officer in the security service acknowledged that the unveiling of Bin Laden's plans in Israel occured as much as three years too late.

The security services feel that Israel remains a target for Bin Laden. His motivation may increase as a result of criticism, voiced inside the organization, about the failure to sufficiently support the Palestinians in their struggle against Israel.

Officials at the IDF's General Staff believe that Israel is better prepared to handle attacks of the sort experienced by the United States last Tuesday.

"For years, we have taken stringent security measures in order to prevent attacks against our strategic assets," a member of the General Staff said last Thursday. "The hijacking of aircraft and the penetration of our airspace are things that have been taken into account.

"There will be a need to reassess the philosophy of our preparedness in view of the lessons from New York. A process of studying the lessons and refreshing the orders [for security] has already begun."

Yoram Shweitzer, a researcher on the subject of terrorism at the Interdisciplinary Center in Herzliya, is sure that Israel is still a target.

"[Bin Laden's] statements, like the operations that have been prevented, reflect this clearly," he said.

While the trial of Ukal is still continuing, there is no available information on the arrests of other terrorists linked with Bin Laden. However, Chief of Military Intelligence Major General Amos Malka said recently, "Bin Laden has already tried and will surely try to reach Israel again. He will do this by trying to infiltrate here or by trying to recruit people from the territories. He will try different creative ways."

Sutton Group Admiral: over 100 agents and counting

The "little company that grew" — now over 100 agents and counting — is one of the very few Cinderella stories in the hard-nosed real estate industry. Toronto real estate Brokers Sol & Murray Goldkind now spend much of their time interviewing top agents interested in joining their team.

Murray Goldkind

"What an agent really wants most is to affiliate with the right company and sell as much real estate as they can with the fewest headaches possible. Every top agent we talk to is interested in one thing: making more money. But they also want their independence," says Murray.

According to the Goldkinds, top agents are now looking for service-oriented environments without the rigid structure of yesteryear — exactly the kind of productive atmosphere the Goldkinds see themselves providing.

Many agents like the idea of being productive without having to be in the office every day. When they are in the office, agents with Sutton Group Admiral all have access to the latest computer facilities, and enjoy full use of the latest in personal marketing and career management software. Sutton Group Admiral uses a "fee-for-service" concept, which lets agents pick and choose the services they want. In this way there are never any hidden costs passed on to an agent, nor are agents ever penalized by waste generated by others. In other words, each agent, acting as his or her own businessperson, enjoys the benefit of controlling their income and their expenses. "In the old days, top agents concentrated nearly exclusively on their income, but today the smart agents are looking just as strongly at their bottom line," says Murray.

"Fee for services" concept

The Sutton Group Admiral advantage offers a serious real estate agent the best of all worlds. More money in their pocket, freedom to operate at their own level, flexibility in business planning, and access to tools and services. Says Sol, "timing isn't everything, it's just 98%, and as timing goes we are comfortable that we have the concept agents are looking for both now and in the future."

Sol Goldkind

The agents and brokers of Sutton Group Admiral Realty wish you a very Happy, Healthy, and Peaceful New Year

L'chaim's grand opening a celebration of life, light

L'chaim Retirement Home proved to be exactly as advertised

They'd been advertising it for months: a new, wonderfully different kind of retirement home that promised to allow the more independent older members of your family to enjoy a true "golden age", in an active lifestyle environment. A place that would attend to their needs while encouraging them to keep going, keep "maching", keep their engine moving — not settle into a rut. A place that would pave the way for new experiences and friendships.

If the eagerly-anticipated grand opening of L'chaim Retirement Home is any indication, it will not only meet these expectations, but far surpass them. From the physical environment to the staff, this place just "feels" young.

For starters, there's more natural light in the front lobby and dining area than in some whole buildings. What an uplifting way to enjoy your daily meals — bathed in sunshine! The facilities, as promised, are state-of-the-art, the cooking haymishe, the programming thorough, the attention personal — yet the entire package can be enjoyed for less than at many other retirement homes!

Underscoring the youthful spirit, founder Judy Cohen and Directors Wendy Isenberg and Lorraine Sherkin carry their many years of devoted service in the retirement field with a vim, vigour and enthusiasm that belie their chronological age.

As the newest addition to the Bathurst-Sheppard neighbourhood, L'chaim's rejuvenative qualities give new meaning to the phrase "right on campus."

Day care, respite care now offered

In addition to traditional full-time residence, L'chaim now offers day care and convalescent care. Guests can stay a day, a weekend, a few months — and have access to the same programs and services as the full-time residents. Says founder Judy Cohen, "it's perfect for those who need a short-term alternative to other, more traditional environments. We're like a mini Miami right here in Toronto — and we're a lot more fun."

Toronto songwriter finds his roots in Nashville

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Only after moving to Nashville, Tenn. did Eddie Schwartz really learn to appreciate his Jewish and Canadian roots.

The songwriter, who has had 200 songs recorded by such artists as Joe Cocker, the Doobie Brothers and Pat Benetar, may be best known for his song Hit Me With Your Best Shot.

He is currently producing Zygote, a Canadian Jewish rock band, as well as Johnny Reid, a Scottish singer, for Dreamworks.

Four years ago, Eddie and his wife, Joanne, and their two children, Ira and Emma, moved to Nashville from Toronto, where he grew up.

Eddie's late father, Gordon, owned Fairlawn Pharmacy and his mother, Miriam, was born in New York and moved to Toronto after getting married.

As a child, Eddie remembers his father breaking with the Orthodox community in favour of a more cultural approach to the Jewish world.

For Eddie, being Jewish meant having a bar mitzvah, having Jewish friends and attending Jewish camps – Yungvelt, Kvutsah and Naivelt.

"I believe that Camp Naivelt was started by three Jewish Communists and about 400 RCMP officers hiding in the bushes," Eddie said jokingly.

"But by the time I got there it was only quasi-political," he added. "It was as ideological as every place there were kids was in the '60s."

After marrying and having kids, Eddie and the family moved to Cedarvale, where Eddie never felt any need to reinforce his Jewishness.

"I was surrounded by it all the time – most of our neighbours were Jewish and most of the kids in our children's classes were Jewish.

"However, in Nashville, we found ourselves in a place where being Canadians and being Jewish was a real oddity."

All of a sudden, religion and nationality became issues that the Schwartzes were forced to deal with almost on a daily basis.

"When we first moved to Nashville," Eddie recalled, "many of the neighbours came over with cakes and cookies.

"They were incredibly friendly, but the first question they invariably asked was, 'Which church do you go to?'

"That was a real slap in the face for us," he said. "We weren't quite sure how to handle that because we came from a place where no one ever asks about your religion.

"In the South, religion occupies a huge space in the culture – all community activities seem to revolve around the church.

"We started to worry that our children would be ostracized because of their differences," Eddie said.

The next shock came when their children began to attend school.

"Before our son began school, we met with his teacher to explain that coming from Canada, Ira had not really studied American history or geography.

"The first day of class, the whole class broke into laughter when Ira was asked by the teacher to point Seattle out on the map and he didn't know where it was.

Eddie Schwartz poses with his wife Joanne and children Emma and Ira.

"Ira was mortified because of her insensitivity," Eddie said.

"Over time, we realized the teacher wasn't trying to be mean. It's just that she didn't have a clue what we were talking about.

"She couldn't imagine that anyone from another country wouldn't know where Seattle was. That's how completely wrapped up in themselves Americans are."

Eddie and Joanne then began to explore the possibility of joining a community centre or synagogue.

They discovered a new Jewish community in Nashville centred around the music industry and an older Jewish community that dates back to the civil war, Eddie explained.

"Who do you think made those Confederate soldiers their grey suits?" he asked.

"In the end, I connected with a synagogue that was close to the spirit I had known as a child."

Eddie and his family now participate in many of the synagogue's activities and have developed friendships and a sense of community.

"People in the South are so strongly attached to Southern Baptism or the Church of Christ. They tend to be bonded in a way that if you're not of those faiths, you're not able to share their experiences. So you feel very left out and alienated.

"When you feel like you're being excluded from a club – all of a sudden it becomes important to belong to some club.

"Being Jewish provides you with an instant community," Eddie said.

Film shows tension between tradition and modernity

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Late Marriage, Dover Kosashvili's accomplished first feature film, is a fascinating, largely light-hearted glimpse into Georgian Jewish culture in Israel.

Screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, it skillfully portrays the endemic tension between tradition and modernity.

By turns amusing and ominous, Late Marriage is the first and only Israeli movie in Georgian and Hebrew.

Zaza, the main character, is a 31-year-old PhD philosophy student whose traditional Georgian parents are trying to find him an ideal mate.

There are certain requirements. She must be a virgin, pretty, from a good family, preferably wealthy and, of course, Georgian.

Zaza's formidable mother, Lily, is the ultimate matchmaker. She has already introduced him to 100 women, and as the film opens, he is on the verge of meeting Ilana in her parents' home.

Ilana, though only 17, is a tough cookie. "Tell me something I don't know," she taunts Zaza shortly after they meet.

Zaza and Ilana engage in a little foreplay in the privacy of her room, but this relationship is doomed. Ilana is simply too young for this suitor.

No matter. Lily will not take no for an answer. She is determined to marry off Zaza to someone suitable.

Unbeknownst to her and her equally stubborn husband, Yasha, Zaza is already in love with Judith, a slightly older woman of Moroccan origin, a divorcee with a six-year-old daughter.

Upon finding out Zaza's secret, Yasha blurts out, "Can't you leave that bitch?"

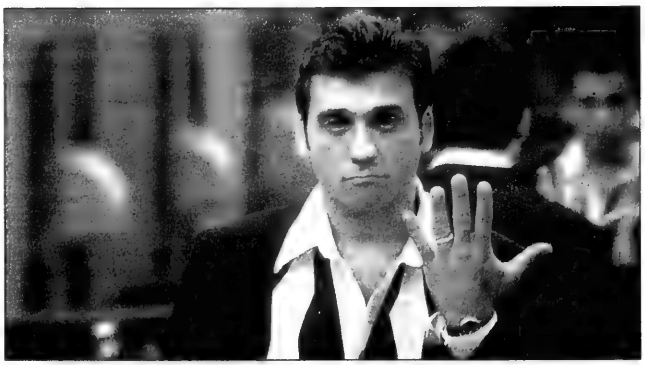
Since Zaza has no intention of leaving Judith, his parents decide to act unilaterally. They confront Judith in her apartment, in a rollicking scene characterized by gentle appeals and menacing threats.

It is left to Zaza to resolve what has degenerated into a serious problem, for himself, Judith and his parents.

Late Marriage, which is sexually explicit, alternates between comedy and drama, and Kosashvili directs it with a sure, steady hand which belies his inexperience as a director.

The performances are highly credible. As Zaza, Lior Loui Ashkenazi hits the right notes. Ronit Elkabetz's portrayal of Judith is just as empathetic.

Charged with dramatic electricity and subtle humour, Late Marriage takes its rightful place in the pantheon of Israeli filmography.



Lior Loui Ashkenazi wants to find the perfect mate in Late Marriage.

Director dreams of Hollywood

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – When Dover Kosashvili was ten years old, he confided in a friend that he had stars in his eyes.

"I wanted to go to Hollwood," he explained.

Kosashvili, born in Georgia and raised in Israel, has yet to achieve his dream.

But he is getting there, judging by the success of his first feature film, Late Marriage.

A family drama with comedic overtones about Georgian Jews in Israel, it was screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival. It previously won prizes at a succession of film festivals.

Kosashvili, 34, immigrated to Israel with his family in 1972, along with tens of thousands of Georgian Jews who left the Soviet Union.

He studied philosphy and film at Tel Aviv University, but never graduated. Nevertheless, his graduation project, With Rules, a 35-minute short about a 12-year old Georgian Jewish boy with an embarrassing secret, received several international prizes.

He turned to film because he could not imagine doing anything else.

"What can I tell you," he said in an interview in a sunny courtyard of the Intercontinental Hotel. "It was a dream since childhood."

Late Marriage, scheduled to open in Israel in November, has been bought by Canadian distributors. Kosashvili is currently working on a U.S. distribution deal.

It was made on a shoestring $850,000 budget, a piddling sum by North American standards.

Financing was provided by the Israeli government, Israel's Channel Two and Arte Cinema in France.

It's very much autobiographical, though certain details were changed.

"It's an accurate portrayal of Georgian Jews in Israel," said Kosashvili, the eldest of four children.

There are some 120,000 Georgians in Israel, scattered throughout the country. Kosashvili and his parents live in Or Yehuda, a development town near Tel Aviv.

Yasha, his father, was a photographer in Georgia. In Israel, he has worked as an airplane mechanic.

His mother plays herself in the movie. "I tried to cast an Israeli actor, but it didn't work out."

Director Dover Kosashvili [Stephen Epstein photo]

He could not find a professional actor whose Georgian pronunciation was authentic.

His mother was not only pleased with her performance, but with the movie itself.

Currently, Kosashvili is working on his second feature, A Gift from the Sky, which is about a group of shady Georgian porters at Ben-Gurion Airport.

Like Late Marriage, it is in Georgian and Hebrew, with a smattering of Russian.

He has just finished the script, and is now in the midst of rounding up funds.

Like Zaza in Late Marriage, he remains an eligible bachelor. His mother, however, has stopped pestering him about marriage.

"She's not matchmaking anymore. Maybe she trusts me more," he said, a mischevious smile wreathing his face.

A Mideast perspective from Israeli and Palestinian youths

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Promises, a bracing documentary turning on the underlying attitudes shaping the Arab-Israeli dispute, examines one of its relatively unexplored nooks: perspectives on the issue from Israeli and Palestinian Arab youngsters.

Screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, this important film features seven Israelis and Palestinians, aged nine to 13, from Jerusalem and environs.

They live within close proximity of each other, but inhabit separate, different and perhaps irreconcilable worlds.

Co-produced by Justine Shapiro and B.Z. Goldberg, Promises was shot during a relatively quiet period, from 1997 to early 2000, after the signing of the Oslo accords but shortly before the outbreak of the second Palestinian uprising.

It unfolds against the backdrop of lively Jerusalem street scenes, Israeli soldiers manning security checkpoints, Jews and Arab at prayers and a militantly anti-Israel parade.

The Israelis are Yarko and Daniel, secular twins whose grandfather is a Holocaust survivor; Shlomo, a haredi boy who studies Torah 12 hours a day, and Moishe, a resident of the West Bank settlement of Beit El.

The Palestinians are Mahmoud, a blue-eyed supporter of Hamas; Sanabel, a third-generation refugee whose father languishes in an Israeli prison, and Faraj, whose grandparents once lived in a village in Israel.

Yarko and Daniel speak of their dread of suicide bombers and of their aversion to haredim. They express liberal political views.

Shlomo, the son of a rabbi who seems preternaturally wise and aware, feels very safe in his milieu and distant from Palestinians. In a quirky scene, he engages in a burping contest with a Palestinian boy.

Moishe, whose friend was killed by terrorists, believes God promised Israel to the Jews and hopes that, somehow or other, the Palestinians will disappear. "We know this land is ours," he declares.

Mahmoud, whose family owns a spice and coffee shop, is a militant in the making. His beliefs are unyielding: Jerusalem belongs to the Palestinians; Jews are mean and deceitful and should be killed; there will be no peace until Jews "return" the land, where, if they wish, they may live as "guests."

Sanabel breaks down in tears when she talks about her imprisoned father, a member of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine. She performs in a traditional dance extolling Palestinian nationalism. She visits her dad in jail.

Faraj seethes with anger, denounces Israel's checkpoints, visits a demolished Arab village in Israel with his grandmother, demands the return of his homeland and admits that when he sees a Jew, he wants to throw a stone.

Promises climaxes when the twins, but not Shlomo and Moishe, visit their Palestinian counterparts in the Deheishe refugee camp on the outskirts of Jerusalem.

The twins are given a brief tour of the camp, during which they are shown bullet holes in cinder block buildings from the first intifadah and Hamas graffiti on walls. Then they join Faraj, Sanabel and their friends for a meal, a pickup game of soccer and a lesson in using a slingshot, the weapon of choice in the 1987-91 Palestinian uprising.

The socializing, of course, is skin deep. Faraj realizes that their get-together is a transitory event and that friendships cannot be formed here. Sanabel is more upbeat, calling for more such meetings to foster mutual awareness and respect.

The twins are pleased with the visit, but physical and cultural obstacles preclude future exchanges.

Promises posits the hope that mutual understanding is possible but not probable, at least for now. The message is depressing but hardly surprising.

Intifadah would have made filming Promises impossible, movie's co-producer says

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Promises could not have been filmed in today's incendiary political climate, B.Z. (Ben Zion) Goldberg, the co-producer, admits.

Here to preview his 100-minute documentary at the Toronto International Film Festival, he acknowledged that the second intifadah has made it virtually impossible for Israelis to travel to the autonomous Palestinian areas.

In Promises, Israeli and Palestinian youngsters express their views of the conflict and, toward the close, meet in a Palestinian refugee camp near Jerusalem.

Similar encounters were not unusual before the eruption of the Palestinian uprising a year ago on Sept. 28. But now, with casualties on both sides escalating, they are definitely a thing of the past.

"The Palestinian Authority frowns very strongly on such meetings," said Goldberg, a 38-year-old filmmaker who holds dual American and Israeli citizenships.

He and his co-producer, Justine Shapiro, were worried that Promises would be rendered superfluous by the intifadah. But the opposite has happened. The uprising has generated still more interest in Israel's historic dispute with the Palestinians.

To Goldberg, the attitudes expressed by the kids are really paradigmatic. "Moishe wants all Arabs to leave. Faraj wants his land back and freedom of movement. Sanabel wants all Palestinian prisoners out of jail."

Goldberg, who was born in Boston and raised in Jerusalem, lamented that Jews and Arabs simply do not know each other despite living cheek by jowl.

"To a Palestinian, Jew means occupier and soldier. To an Israeli, Palestinian means stone thrower, terrorist or, at best, waiter or construction worker. It's sad."

Promises, which officially will be premiered in Israel on Oct. 21 and televised on the Public Broadcasting System (PBS) on Dec. 13 at 9 p.m., was produced by The Promises Film Project.

It is a non-profit organization committed to using film to educate audiences about peace and the Mideast peace process.

Funding was provided by PBS, The Open Society (George Soros), The National Endowment for the Arts, the National Foundation for Jewish Culture (Steven Spielberg) and the Lyn & Norman Lear Family Foundation.

Goldberg, who is currently working on a North American distribution deal, said that some of the youngsters who appear in Promises have hardened their views.

"Yet Mahmoud, oddly enough, has softened," he said. "After seeing Promises, he realized that not all Israelis and soldiers are settlers."

In the film, Mahmoud comes across as the most radical exponent of Palestinian nationalism.

Goldberg, who has been a soundman and field producer for CNN, NBC and BBC, said he found the kids through word of mouth. "We saw about 100, settled on 15 and used seven."

Goldberg, who moved to Israel with his family when he was seven years old, has lived in San Francisco for about the past year. "But I have a strong desire to go back. Israel is my real home."

Eye on Arts

By Bill Gladstone

PEOPLE OF THE BOOK

As we turn the page into the New Year of 5762, Eye On Arts presents its annual survey of what some people in the arts and literary community are reading.

Toronto novelist Cary Fagan has been reading The Bird Artist, by Howard Norman (St. Martin's Press, 1995), which he says "is not Norman's latest – his latest is The Museum Guard – but I think it's his best. It's a superb and peculiar book and he has a voice very intensely his own. His books are in a minor key, which always appeals to me: they're small stories as opposed to big dramatic stories of 500 pages and dozens of characters."

The Bird Artist is set in Newfoundland in the early 1900s, Fagan relates. "It focuses on a young man who is a bird artist, someone who draws and paints birds for a scientific publication. He explains in the novel why he murdered the lighthouse keeper in the area in which he lives."

Fagan's books include Felix Roth; The Animals' Waltz, and a new children's book, Daughter of the Great Zandini, scheduled for release by Tundra Books this fall. He is due to read at the Vancouver Jewish Book Fair in November.

"I couldn't put it down," Lilian Nattel said of Helen Epstein's Where She Came From: A Daughter's Search for Her Mother's History (Little Brown, 1997).

Nattel, Toronto-based author of the award-winning novel The River Midnight, describes Epstein's non-fiction work as "a family memoir of her great-grandmother's, her grandmother's and her mother's lives. They came from the region of the Czech Republic and Bohemia, in the vicinity of Prague. They had particularly interesting lives: her grandmother and mother were couturiers and had a fashionable dress salon in Prague.

"The author went to all the places that the book is concerned with, and researched not only Jewish history but Jewish life in these places. Plus, she describes her search, which is also quite interesting. I think it's a gripping book."

Nattel is currently writing a second novel, which she hopes to complete next year.

Montreal-based writer Norman Ravvin, whose travel book Hidden Canada recently hit the bookstores, has been catching up on his reading. "I've just gotten into Letting Go, by Philip Roth," he says. "It's an early 1960s novel, usually described as his worst, so I've never read it. It's been sitting on my shelf for 15 years."

But Ravvin has been favourably impressed. "It's good; it's funny; it's his usual shtick," he says. "It's about a young man studying in Iowa, and the strong friends that he's met and the family predicament that he's in. It's written in a sort of sharp New York language and the characters talk like New York Jews. But Jewish issues don't seem to play a role as usual – maybe that's why readers didn't take to it."

Ravvin teaches Jewish studies at Concordia University. His second novel, Lola By Night, is due for publication by paperplates, a small Toronto press.

Actor-playwright Theresa Tova, whose award-winning play Still the Night was published in 1999, has just start reading Nathan Englander's collection of stories, For the Relief of Unbearable Urges (Knopf, 1999). "What a find!"she says, after finishing several of the stories, including The Twenty-Seventh Man, The Tumblers and the title piece.

"What a courageous young writer he is – it's just amazing that he says the things he says. To have me laughing one moment and then clutching at my stomach wanting to cry, all in one story. He says things that just stun me. He's just amazing."

Tova is currently negotiating to get Still the Night translated into Yiddish.

Toronto author Michael Kaufman, whose novel The Possibility of Dreaming On A Night Without Stars won a Canadian Jewish Book Award in June, has just finished reading Anil's Ghost, by Michael Ondaatje (McClelland and Stewart, 2000). The story, he says, is set in Ondaatje's native Sri Lanka and recounts the horrors that have occurred there in recent years.

"It's an incredible book – there's a deceptive simplicity about his writing style," Kaufman says. "I found, as a writer reading him, that so often he finds a word or a phrase and you say, 'That is perfect.' There was one phrase that he used – I don't know how many times I read it to myself – it was just stunning."

Kaufman, a public educator on gender issues, is working on a second novel.

Museum's emphasis on Jewish Vienna

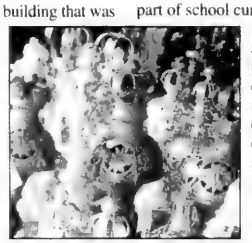
By NANCY WIGSTON
Special to The CJN

VIENNA — On a recent trip, I asked a friend who lives here where the Jewish Museum was located.

"Which one?" came the response. "There are so many."

While that may be an overstatement, it's undeniable that there is much for the visitor to learn about Jewish Vienna. The Jewish Museum, founded and financed by the City of Vienna in 1989, maintains a strong presence in the old city.

Housed in an 18th-century building that was completely renovated in 1996, the museum has a café with a welcoming atmosphere close to the entrance. The upper floors hold visiting exhibitions, a permanent collection of religious objects from the Viennese community, and a holographic display. A large archival library open to all by appointment occupies the top floor.



Loads of Torah finials in the Vienna Jewish Museum.

Eighty to 100 events take place on the premises each year, and as many as 100,000 people come to visit.

"This is not a Holocaust museum," says public relations director Dr. Alfred Stalzer, "although part of the museum deals with the Holocaust."

The emphasis is on Jewish Vienna, which has a long history. The first synagogue was built here in the 13th century; it was destroyed in a pogrom in 1421. There was a ghetto on a peninsula on the Danube River in the 16th and 17th centuries.

When Emperor Joseph II declared an edict of tolerance in the 18th century, many Viennese Jews showed their gratitude by choosing the name "Joseph" for their sons.

During the Nazi regime, 65,000 of Vienna's 180,000 Jews were killed. Some 10,000 to 12,000 Jews live in Vienna today; some are in transit to Israel. The city has five synagogues and 10 prayer rooms, and one female rabbi. At Vienna's Jewish Institute, students can learn Yiddish and kosher cookery, and attend discussions on a variety of topics.

The Max Berger collection, displayed on the main floor, offers a myriad of objects, from the simple to the ornate, all drawn from Austrian Jewish life, each marking a holiday on the Jewish calendar.

The Torahs, menorahs and other artifacts are reminders that this city once boasted 89 synagogues, all but one of which were destroyed on Nov. 9-10, 1938. Long ignored by officialdom, this period in modern history is now a required part of school curricula here.

On the fourth floor, another permanent exhibit proves equally fascinating: an enormous variety of religious artifacts, including Torah crowns, shields, curtains – everything that was stolen and packed away in wooden boxes by the Nazis, who then forgot about them. The museum regularly seeks out missing parts of these sets and buys them back when they become available at auction.

Stalzer says a whole year's budget was recently spent at Sotheby's in Tel Aviv, to reclaim a particularly beautiful Viennese Torah shield.

The permanent holographic exhibition makes this museum unique. Three-dimensional, yet intangible, the holographs illustrate themes in the history of Austrian Jews, while seeming to float in air, mimicking the nuances of memory and history.

The current (until Sept. 23) visiting exhibit – one of a half dozen shown during the year – belongs to the Bill Gross family of Tel Aviv. It spotlights Judaica in the Jewish Diaspora past and present, in 33 cities around the globe.

The museum recently highlighted Viennese personalities, including the popular Yiddish cabaret star Karl Farkas (who returned to his home-town to host his own long-running TV show after the war.

Five minutes away from the museum, in Judenplatz, there is an impressive new monument to Austrian Jews who died in the Holocaust. The idea of a memorial to Austrian Jews was conceived six years ago by Nazi hunter and Viennese resident Simon Wiesenthal. Designed by British artist Rachel Whiteread, the large square block resembles a series of books on library shelves, with sealed doors in front.

The work evokes the learning central to Jewish tradition, while the dead space in its centre symbolizes the slaughtered Jews of Austria.

Just steps away from the memorial, visitors can descend into the foundations of a medieval synagogue built in the square. Destroyed in 1421, the original synagogue, now several metres below sidewalk level, was excavated a few years ago; today visitors can walk around the remains of its interior, which dates back to 1240.

The history of the flourishing medieval Viennese community is told in interactive displays in showrooms above the ruins.

On the ground floor, three computer terminals store the names and fates of Austrian Jews, where their birth and death dates, and place of death, can be accessed by visitors. Upstairs, the history of the new memorial is recounted in the Simon Wiesenthal Room. Wiesenthal himself was among the guests present at last year's opening.

The Jewish Museum in Vienna is at Fratternhof 2/106, A-1010 Vienna. Judenplatz Museum is at Judenplatz 8, A-1010 Vienna. The Web site is www.jmw.at.

Jewish students bring back the truth to campuses

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — The Hebrew word emet means truth.

And truth was the guiding principle behind a three-week International Hillel program at Tel Aviv University (TAU) in Israel called EMET, designed to bring the facts about the current Middle East crisis to students.

"The whole idea was to come back with a proactive, instead of a reactive agenda," said Michal Kedem, 22, one of only two Canadians – both in their final year at McGill University – to take part in the summer think-tank program.

Kedem and Ethy Cohen, also 22, were among the 40 students, or EMET "fellows," selected from among 100 North American applicants for the fully funded initiative, which involved a series of classes, seminars and workshops, as well as travel through Israel.

In the wake of last week's terrorist attacks on the World Trade Center and the Pentagon the day following the original interview with Cohen and Kedem, Kedem told The CJN that a "mass e-mail" took place among EMET fellows all over North America, including Boston, New York and Washington, D.C.

Kedem herself received one from Washington participant Arielle Nathan, saying that she was fine.

This year EMET, whose official name is EMET: An Educational Initiative Inc., was a pilot project, and it is hoped it will become an annual event.

The project was developed in response to the current uprising in Israel, which has produced an unprecedented negative image of the Jewish State, not only on student campuses, but in the media and the world as a whole.

Florida philanthropist Leonard Abramson conceived of EMET after talking with Israeli Prime Minister Ariel Sharon. They were both concerned about the lack of effective Israeli hasbarah and intent on doing something about it. Other Jewish philanthropists connected to Hillel who came forward to support the project included Bernard Marcus, Edgar Bronfman, Michael Steinhardt, Lynn Schusterman and Charles Bronfman.

The two main elements of the EMET program, Kedem and Cohen said, are what took place in Israel at TAU and the follow-up activities to take place here in the coming year.

The program in Israel, run out of TAU's Jaffee Centre for Strategic Studies, included intensive study of Israel's role in the Middle East and development of effective proactive strategies to be implemented after participants returned home.

Cohen, who like Kedem is ardently Zionist and plans to make aliyah, said one of the challenges is that Jewish students, in contrast to their Palestinian counterparts, are more varied in their political sensibilities and less focused as a whole, and therefore have not been as ready to have a unified strategy.

"Arab students have been much more unified," she said.

Kedem agreed. "Palestinian students focus only on the Palestinian cause, while Jewish students deal with everything."

Part of the strategy, therefore, will be to underscore the importance of unified support of Israel (regardless of where you sit in the political spectrum), and to educate and empower students, who are sometimes caught off-guard because they don't have all the facts at their fingertips.

Fact sheets, retreats, co-ordination and collaboration among CEGEP and university campuses, bringing in out-of-province students, "Israel 101" sessions – all these tools and more will be used, Kedem and Cohen said.

"The key is knowledge," Kedem said. "We want to develop allies everywhere."

Despite the spate of suicide bombings over the last year, neither Kedem nor Cohen expressed any reservations about having gone to Israel for the EMET program. Both have been to Israel several times previously as students and volunteers.

"Everywhere we went, people said thank you for coming," Kedem said.

"It's the best way to show solidarity," Cohen said.

"It's my home," Kedem said.

British Jews on heightened alert

By RICHARD ALLEN GREENE
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

LONDON — While American Jews have cancelled an Israel solidarity rally scheduled for next weekend, British Jews have expanded their rally to include support of the United States, following last week's terror attacks on New York and Washington.

The rally, scheduled for Sept. 23 in downtown London, is expected to attract 2,500 people, which would make it the largest Jewish event of its kind here in years.

Yet even while they make plans to demonstrate in support of the United States, many British Jews are worried about family and friends in the United States.

"There will inevitably be a number of British Jews who will have been lost," a Jewish security expert said.

A spokesperson for the Board of Deputies, the umbrella organization that represents most British Jews, said that "due to the nature of the firms in the buildings, numerous British Jews have been touched by the event."

As many as 300 British citizens are believed to have died in the attacks, although its not clear how many Jews are among them.

One British newspaper said the terrorist attack resulted in the largest number of British people ever killed in a single day outside of wartime.

Scotland Yard has asked the London-based Jewish Emergency Support Services to be ready to provide counselling to Jews in Britain and the United States who have been affected by the tragedy.

British Jewry remains on a state of high security alert, as it has been for several months.

The aforementioned British Jewish security expert said the attack was not a complete surprise.

"We were told months ago to expect a major terrorist outrage, but didn't know the target or when or where," said the security expert, who asked not to be identified.

He warned that "if the U.S. and Britain strike back, as they undoubtedly will, there could be retaliation" against Jewish targets.

Winston Pickett of the Institute for Jewish Policy Research, a London-based think tank, said British Jews face another problem that American Jews do not face in the wake of the attack – an ambivalent message from the media.

The day after the attack, the Guardian newspaper published a commentary by Muslim journalist Faisal Bodi saying that the World Trade Center and Pentagon mean different things to Americans than to Muslims.

"Inside America, the Trade Center, the Pentagon, Camp David and Capitol Hill are all seen as symbols of global U.S. power and prestige, of the triumph of democracy. Outside, in the Muslim world, they are popularly regarded as symbols of terror and oppression," he wrote. "Yesterday's attacks are the chickens of America's callous abuse of others' human rights coming home to roost."

Barry Kosmin, the policy institute's director, said that such commentary was a result of the over-representation of the extreme left in the British media.

"We saw it in the Gulf War – they feel sympathy for every Third World dictator," he said. "The attempt to be even-handed has meant that extremist Muslims are given more air time than would be expected."

The BBC, meanwhile, apologized for its Sept. 13 episode of its public affairs discussion program Question Time in which a disproportionate percentage of the audience appeared to be extremist Muslims who attacked the United States.

The Board of Deputies has requested a videotape of the program and is considering filing a complaint.

But the vast majority of the British public is solidly behind the United States in the wake of the attack.

-The Star-Spangled Banner was played at the changing of the guard at Buckingham Palace on Sept. 13, and a tearful Queen Elizabeth sang it at a memorial service last Friday – the first time the queen ever has sung another country's national anthem.

The mainstream Muslim Council of Britain unequivocally condemned the attacks.

"No cause can justify this carnage. We hope those responsible will swiftly be brought to justice for their unconscionable deeds," council officials said in a statement.

But Kosmin said British Jews had to be on their guard in the wake of the attack.

"There is a clear line, even among Muslim moderates, that this attack is all to do with the Palestinians," he said.

Catcher won't let disability slow him down

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Darryl Silverstein was barely 13 years old, he experienced a life-altering event that would have emotionally devastated most young teens. One morning he woke up and could barely see out of his left eye.

While he slept, Silverstein had suffered an eye hemorrhage, a rare event for youngsters just entering their teens.

Known as macular degeneration, it's a malady that usually strikes senior citizens and which, with surgery, is curable in 80 percent of cases. "I got the 20 percent," he says.

The condition left him legally blind in the eye and with the knowledge it will likely, one day, perhaps tomorrow, perhaps in 50 years, strike his remaining good eye. Despite his misfortune, Silverstein has not let it get him down. He displays a positive, can-do attitude in which he refuses to let his condition dictate the terms of his life or his love of sports.

"I never let that interfere with my baseball," the 18-year-old athlete says.

At the time, Silverstein was a starting catcher with Leaside Lightning, a midtown Toronto rep team that plays hardball at its home diamond at Bayview and Eglinton. He'd been playing since he was 10, and he loved the game and the competition.

When misfortune struck, he was left unsure of his future in sports. With the support of his coaches, he continued to catch and remained a key member of the Lightning.

Silverstein acknowledges that with the handicap restricting him, he couldn't fully blossom as a ball player the way other young people did, but it pushed him to work harder.

"I worked with my coaches for a long, long time to try to get my hitting to improve," he said. A righty, Silverstein had to open his stance so he could get a better view of the ball coming in.

When catching, he was vexed by all the bars in the catcher's mask blocking his already limited view. "Sheer determination" and the fact that "I don't mind getting hit on the head" helped him overcome his lack of depth perception and overall vision, he said.

It was a difficult adjustment, but one that he's made successfully over the last five years. "Now, I can judge the ball better," he said. "Now, it's becoming easier."

In 1998, he was selected to Toronto's team at the youth Maccabi/JCC games in Michigan, which won a silver medal. His coach with the Maccabi boys was Dan Bleiwas, who also happens to serve as head coach with the Ontario Blue Jays, an under-18 team that is among the best squads in the province.

Bleiwas recruited Silverstein as a bullpen catcher with the Blue Jays. Although he rarely gets into games, he's an important member of the Blue Jays, helping warm up pitchers and communicating with the coaches.

The Blue Jays compete in the Ontario Connie Mack League versus teams from London, Windsor and Hamilton. Their schedule also includes numerous exhibitions and tournaments against NCAA colleges, including Bowling Green, the University of West Virginia, Duquesne University, Michigan State and Kansas State.

Earlier this summer, sporting a 64-12 record, the Blue Jays represented the North Central Region, which includes teams from Canada, Michigan and Ohio, at the prestigious Connie Mack World Series at Farmington, N.M. Playing against top American teams and one from Puerto Rico, the Blue Jays finished seventh out of eight.

Despite their disappointing showing, the Blue Jays remain a baseball factory, developing numerous prospects who go on to U.S. college baseball (as many as 200 overall) and a chance of being selected in the Major League draft (about 10 to 20 alumni are now toiling in baseball's minor leagues). Although his vision problems likely preclude him from following that route, Silverstein's determination and will to succeed have led him in other directions.

"Getting this eye problem was a blessing in disguise," he said.

In Grade 11 at Westmount Collegiate, he was elected vice-president of the student council, and the next year, he was chosen president. He's won the Staff Award and a Special Education Award that recognized his leadership, academic achievements and community involvement.

He serves as player/coach on the Thornhill school's baseball team, the Wolves, which was undefeated in the 2000 regular season.

With marks that generally hover around 80 percent, Silverstein plans to finish his OAC this year and then study sports management at either Brock University or the University of British Columbia.

Darryl Silverstein, with his father, Alan, after capturing the North Central Region championship in Battle Creek, Mich.

In the meantime, his role with the Blue Jays has been expanded to that of bullpen coach, helping to evaluate talent and motivate players. He also has been given some administrative responsibilities, Bleiwas said.

Bleiwas, whose full-time job is Ontario scout for the Atlanta Braves, said Silverstein has what it takes to coach – even at 18.

"With a coach you're looking for maturity, dedication, enthusiasm and understanding. It doesn't matter how old you are as long as you possess what it takes to be a coach," he said.

"Darryl's been through a lot in his life… I think it made him grow up quickly. He's certainly more mature than most 18-year-olds."

For his part, Silverstein likes to see his glass as half full, rather than half empty. His condition has "closed some doors," he admits, "but it's opened other doors."

Dodgers' slugger to sit out Yom Kippur game

By JOE ESKENAZI
Jewish Bulletin of Northern California

SAN FRANCISCO — The Los Angeles Dodgers' Shawn Green possesses the Major League's longest current streak of consecutive games played, with 406 prior to a recent contest in San Diego. Yet that streak will come to an end on Sept. 26, as the power-hitting outfielder announced he will not suit up on Yom Kippur to take on arch-rival San Francisco Giants.

Green, easily the best and most well-known Jewish player in Major League Baseball, is batting .300 with 46 home runs, 116 runs batted in, 108 runs scored and 18 stolen bases. Now in his second season with the Dodgers after bursting into prominence with the Toronto Blue Jays in 1998, the former All-Star and Gold Glove-winning outfielder also possesses a strong and accurate left arm.

Green, 28, is a native of Tustin in Southern California and serves as a spokesperson for the Jewish Federation of Greater Los Angeles, promoting KOREH L.A.: The Los Angeles Jewish Coalition for Literacy.

By sitting out on Yom Kippur, he will be missing a potentially critical game against the Giants. The Dodgers are embroiled in baseball's tightest pennant races, closely trailing the Giants and Arizona Diamondbacks in the National League West, and the Giants, Chicago Cubs and St. Louis Cardinals in the National League wild card race.

"I wouldn't say I'm concerned about it. It's just something that people are going to have to understand," Green told ESPN.com about the possibility of his absence costing the Dodgers a playoff spot. "I guess I'll have to look back at the couple of games that I didn't get hits and be upset about those."

Derrick Hall, the Dodgers' senior vice-president of communications, said the team was not surprised by Green's move, as the star player had told management last year he would skip any post-season game falling on Yom Kippur.

Hall confirmed that Green will be the first Dodger to sit out a Yom Kippur game since Sandy Koufax opted not to pitch in the opening game of the 1965 World Series. Detroit Tigers' all-time great Hank Greenberg also sat out a 1934 contest that fell on Yom Kippur.

ספרותנו

מאת: יעל זליגר

ליפול למעלה: שירים וציורים מאת: של סילברסטין, הוצאת מדן

מעטים הקוראים שאינם מכירים את יצירתו המופלאה של סילברסטין. "העץ הנדיב" הפך מיד לקלאסיקה ספרותית. ואולם, יתכן שלא רבים יודעים שאת עיקר יצירתו רואה סילברסטין בכתיבת שירה לילדים. כל אחד משלושת ספרי שירתו זכה להצלחה וכדרכה של ספרות טובה לילדים, השירים נוגעים ללב ילדים ומבוגרים כאחד.

איזה כיף, מחשב חדש -
מדגם ומדגש
ויודע כל דבר בכל נושא.
ועם כזה מחשב ביתי
אנלא צריך מורה פרטי,
כי אין דבר שהמחשב שילי לא עושה.
הוא בודק ומתקן...
מאיר ומאייר, ומדפיס לי גם משוב.
הוא בורר ומעתיק...
אני מוציא מיד תיספר הראשון שלי
נו טוב, אני צריך לחכות שהוא יחשוב
על מה לכתוב. (יסופר סופר')

כל אחד משלושת ספרי השירה מאויירים על-ידי סילברסטין ומכיל עשרות שירים. האחרון "ליפול למעלה" יצא לאחרונה בתרגום עברי חדש ומעולה של בני ואורי הנדל.

של (שלבי) סילברסטין נולד באמריקה בשנת 1932 למשפחה יהודית. הוא לא רק מצטיין בכתיבה אלא אף בציור, ניגון וצילום. הוא גם אדם מאוד צנוע ובעיקר יודע בדיוק מה ילדים חושבים וחשים, מה מפחיד ומה מצחיק אותם. אכן הוא שומע את קולם של הצעירים.

לכל אחד יש קול בפנים
שכל הזמן לוחש,
יזה טוב לי, זה מתאים לי,
מזה אני חושש.
ואף אחד, מטיף, מורה,
שלא יחליטו בשבילך,
גם לא חבר, גם לא הורה -
הקשב לקול בתוכך. (יהקול')

בשפה כה פשוטה, ללא מאמץ ועם שפע של הומור וכן אהבה כה רבה לילדים הצליח סילברסטין לדעת את נפש הצעירים. יתכן שיותר מכל הוא מבקש להקל על הילדים שהפחד והחרדה משתוללת אצלם. כמו אותו ילד שמדמיין נחש ארסי כ"עונש" שיבוא עליו.

אני פותח תיקפסקה
של ארוחת-הצהרים,
מקוה למצוא פרוסה
או תפוח עסיסי.
אבל שם, לוחש-שורק...
שוב מוכן להשתחרר -
עד נחש צפעון ארסי.
יוצא וזוחל לי...
זה קורה לי כל יום...
יתם חושבים שאמי כועסת עליי?
(תמיד בארוחת-הצהרים)

או ילד אחר (האהוב עלי מכל הילדים המפוחדים אצל סילברסטין) שהמורה העמידה אותו בפינה והוא מחכה ומחכה ומחכה...

המורה אמרה, אתה לא מציית,
משתולל, מתפרע ולא יושב.
אז לך, תעמד עכשו בפנה
עד שאגיד לך יתסתובב'.
אז תכף אני נעמדתי שם...
ואז נגמר היום והיא
שכחה אותי בפנה...
אז בשבת נשארתי עד.
וביום ראשון החפש התחיל,
ונשארתי לעמוד.
ועד אלזל, שאז פתאום
סגרו את בית-הספר!...
אטמו תידלתות ואת כל הפתחים,
עכשו אף-אחד כבר לא מתקרב,
ואני עומד ארבעים שנה
במבנה חשוך, נטוש וחרב
מחכה למורה שתגיד, יתסתובב'...
(ציתי)

.....

מי ייתן ותבוא עלינו ועל כל ילדי אומות העולם שנה ללא פחדים וללא סבל; שנה טובה של שלום ואהבה.

Melting Pot Memories (342 pages, $29.95 Cdn) by Judy Bart Kancigor is a collection of 600 recipes from 159 members of the Rabinowitz family. Packed with nostalgia and humour, it is the story of an immigrant family told through its stomach, from the shtetl to the suburbs.

Dear Norene

It took Judy three years to compile. At a family wedding, Judy sat down with her Aunt Sally (now 92, with all her marbles) who went over all the recipes and told Judy which were worthy of publication. Some recipes were added for sentimental value only.

Here are two easy, delicious recipes for Sukkot. For information on Canadian availability of Melting Pot Memories, call 416-226-2466.

'THE' FAMOUS CHOCOLATE CHIP COOKIES

"Nothin' said lovin' like a tin of Aunt Estelle's chocolate chip cookies. Who can forget the huge tins in her living room always filled to the brim. Did she ever get on a plane or visit without them? Never! Her recipe notes (complete with batter sprays) indicate the original times five!"

1 cup shortening
1 cup brown sugar
1 tsp. vanilla
1/2 tbsp. milk (use juice or water for pareve cookies)
2 eggs
2 1/4 cups flour
1 tsp. baking powder
2 (12-oz.) pkgs. semisweet chocolate chips (or more)

Combine in mixer shortening, sugar, vanilla, milk and eggs. Sift together flour and baking powder and add to mixture a little at a time until blended. Add chocolate chips and stir with wooden spoon. Drop by spoonfuls onto ungreased cookie sheet and bake in preheated oven at 375 about 10 to 12 minutes or until as brown as you like. (For David and Eric, substitute white chocolate chips.)

On the occasion of

it is tradition to make a charitable donation in memory of a loved one or friend.

As Yiskor is observed during High Holy Days, it is a time to remember.

For they offered charity for the memory of their souls

בעד הזכרת נשמתם בעבור שנדבו לצדקה

This mitzvah of "tzedekah" translates into action the promises we make during Yiskor prayers.

"May the words of our mouths become the deeds of our hands."

Let the memory of our loved ones guarantee the future of the Jewish people, and all of Israel.

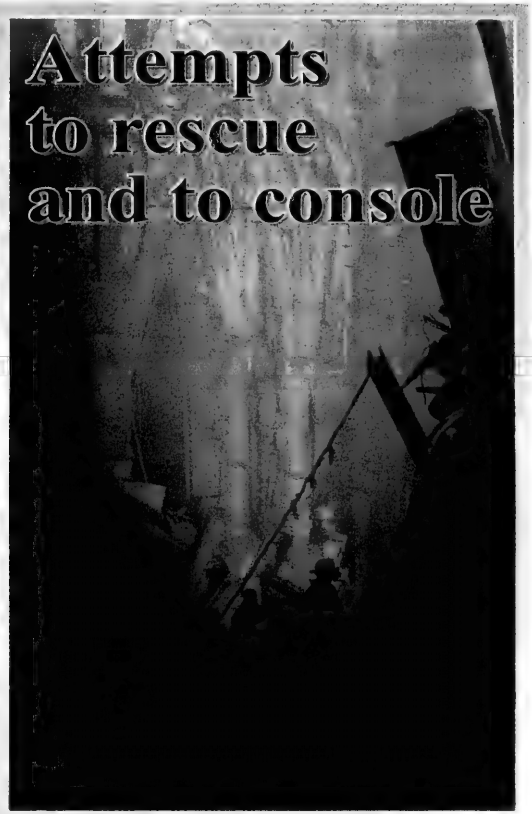
Attempts to rescue and to console



In a scene reminiscent of Dante's Inferno, rescue workers in the heart of ground zero of the destroyed World Trade Center look for victims last week. At the same time, various ceremonies of commemoration and support were held in Israel. Clockwise from left, Kaplan Street in Tel Aviv was temporarily renamed Pentagon Road, Jaffa Road in Jerusalem was renamed New York Street, and more than 35,000 people attended a memorial rally in Tel Aviv. [RNS/Reuters, Isranet and Israel Sun photos]

Mossad gave warning: L.A. Times

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

WASHINGTON — The Mossad warned the United States last month that as many as 200 terrorists linked to Osama bin Laden were slipping into the country to prepare a "major assault on the United States," the Los Angeles Times reported last week.

'Large-scale target'

The warning to the Federal Bureau of Investigation and the Central Intelligence Agency was apparently not acted upon because U.S. authorities said they had "no specific warning" of the suicide bombings at the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon.

The Mossad warned that it had indications the terrorists would act against "a large-scale target" in the United States, and that Americans would be "very vulnerable," the paper said, quoting a high- ranking law enforcement official.

U.S. officials have said they believe there are still more people in the country who might have helped the hijackers plan the operation or helped finance the attacks.

The News in Brief

CANADA

Prayer Message

TORONTO — The following is a message to Canada's Jewish community from Keith Landy, national president of Canadian Jewish Congress, on memorial prayers for the victims of U.S. terror:

"Jewish congregations and communal institutions are now reciting tehillim (psalms) in their daily prayers on behalf of the victims of terror attacks in New York, Washington and in the hijacked airplanes. Jews traditionally recite psalms in dire situations and in the face of great adversity. As we approach the most solemn week in the Jewish religious calendar, we recall that Jews will also be reciting Yizkor on Yom Kippur, in memory of all of the victims and all those we have lost.

"In these difficult times, as we memorialize the victims, we seek solace in prayer to garner the spiritual strength we will need in the time ahead to fight terrorism and prevent this evil from having its intended effects. May we all be comforted by that strength."

ISRAEL

Squelching News

JERUSALEM — About 1,500 Palestinians marched last Friday at a rally in the Gaza Strip where demonstrators carried posters lauding terror mastermind Osama bin Laden. Plainclothes Palestinian police later detained several journalists and confiscated videos of the event, according to the Jerusalem Post. Palestinian officials have reportedly tried to suppress media coverage of Palestinians celebrating the attacks against the United States.

Spin Control

JERUSALEM — Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat is urging Palestinian schoolchildren in the West Bank and Gaza Strip to take part in demonstrations supporting the United States, Israel's Army Radio reported. Arafat and other Palestinian officials have embarked on a damage control campaign after Palestinians took to the streets Sept. 11 to celebrate the terror attacks in New York and Washington.

WORLD

War Criminal Dies

EDINBURGH — A suspected Nazi war criminal died here Sept. 12 at age 85. Scottish officials recently refused to extradite Anton Gecas to his native Lithuania, citing his poor health. Gecas was accused of having been a platoon commander of a pro-Nazi police battalion responsible for the deaths of some 30,000 civilians, including Jews. On Sept. 13, Lithuanian prosecutors vowed to hunt for other Lithuanians accused of Nazi-era war crimes.

Brothers Plead Guilty

LOS ANGELES — Two brothers, both confessed anti-Semites and white supremacists, have pleaded guilty to fire-bombing three synagogues in the Sacramento area two years ago. Benjamin Matthew Williams, 33, considered the instigator in the attacks, faces 30 years in federal prison. His brother, James Tyler Williams, 31, is to receive 18 to 21 years when the sentences are pronounced in November.

Mosque Dedicated

BELGRADE — The dedication this month of a war-damaged mosque in Kosovo that Jews, Catholics and Muslims rebuilt together is providing a rare gleam of hope against the background of religious tensions elsewhere. Taking part in the ceremony were representatives of the American Jewish Joint Distribution Committee, which spearheaded the project, as well as Rexhep Boja, the Kosovar grand mufti, and Mark Sopi, a Roman Catholic bishop. The mosque, in the village of Shqiponje, was one of more than 200 mosques damaged or destroyed during the war in Kosovo in the late 1990s.

Nazi Probe

VADUZ, Liechtenstein — Liechtenstein has created an international commission of historians to probe its wartime history. The move comes some 15 months after the European principality, sandwiched between Switzerland and Austria, was accused by the World Jewish Congress of having helped Nazi officials transfer stolen Jewish assets into western countries and South America at the end of World War II. The government-appointed commission plans to begin its work later this month.

Kabul Jews

KABUL — Two Jews remain in the Afghan capital of Kabul, according to a recent report by the Associated Press. Ishaq Levin, 72, and Zebulon Simentov, 72, live at separate ends of the same decaying synagogue. The congregation's sole Torah scroll has been confiscated by the ruling Taliban. Over 4,000 Afghan Jews have immigrated to Israel since 1948.

Synagogues Receive Preservation Grants

ROME — Synagogues in England and seven eastern and central European countries will receive $140,000 from the World Monuments Fund as part of a preservation program.

The 2001 grant recipients include:

- The Central Synagogue in Sofia, Bulgaria, built in 1906, one of the largest Sephardi synagogues in Europe.
- The 19th-century Prince's Road Synagogue in Liverpool, England. An active Orthodox synagogue, it is one of the few remaining examples in Britain of Victorian Moorish architecture.
- The synagogue in Carpentras, France. Built in 1374, it is one of the oldest synagogues in Europe. It has been in continuous use as a Jewish house of worship since its construction, but restoration work had been stalled due to lack of funding.
- The 18th-century synagogue in Mad, Hungary. Little maintenance has been conducted since 1979.
- The only surviving synagogue in Lvov, Ukraine, built in 1924 and today the centre of an active outreach program to the Jewish community.
- The Choral Synagogue in Kiev, Ukraine, built in 1896. It was the centre of Jewish life in Kiev until it was seized by the Soviets in 1926. It is now a functioning synagogue.

Terrorism victims remembered at local services

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The real aim of terrorism is to demoralize, said Rabbi Elyse Goldstein at a memorial service Sunday night for the victims of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on New York and Washington.

"To that we will not give a victory," she vowed.

"As we continue to wish each other a good and sweet New Year, we pray that some tiny piece of the terrorist plan has been thwarted by our insistence on everydayness."

Rabbi Goldstein is president of the Toronto Board of Rabbis, which sponsored the Interdenominational Jewish Service of Memorial and Hope held at Beth Emeth Bais Yehuda Synagogue and attended by some 600 people.

Earlier that day, while thousands attended a memorial at New York's Yankee Stadium, Toronto remembrances included an interfaith service held at Metro Hall Square and sponsored by Toronto Residents in Partnership (formerly the North York race relations committee).

"We weep for people we've never met," said Rabbi Goldstein. "We weep at the perversion of God's holy name, and through these tears we bring this message: Though there are madmen in the world, the world is not mad. Though there is evil in the world, the world is not evil."

Rabbi Howard Morrison of Beth Emeth, who initiated the plans for the service, said it was "quite a statement" that the sanctuary was virtually filled for the service, which was organized in a matter of three days.

please see page 27

The service concluded with the sound of the shofar, signalling prayer and hope for a strong and stable world once again, Rabbi Morrison explained.

Other speakers included Mike Feldman, City of Toronto councillor; David Young, Ontario's attorney-general; and Meir Romem, Israeli consul-general.

Cantor Aaron Bensoussan of Beth Emeth chanted a version of K'El Maleh Rachamim specifically for the victims of the terror attack, and Cantor Benjamin Maissner of Holy Blossom Temple sang the national anthems of the United States, Canada and Israel. Cantor Anna Trubashnik and rabbis Philip Scheim, Ed Elkin, Baruch Frydman-Kohl, Michael Dolgin and Daniel Gottlieb also took part, as did representatives of B'nai Brith Canada, Canadian Jewish Congress and UJA Federation of Greater Toronto.

Rabbi Dolgin dedicated the psalm he read in memory of an Israeli-born Torontonian who has not been heard from since he called his wife on the morning of Sept. 11. He was leaving early for a 10 a.m. meeting at the World Trade Center in order to buy her a gift, he told her.

There is no welcome mat in Toronto for terrorists, proclaimed Feldman.

The city's population comprises more than 60 ethnic and religious groups, with over 100 languages spoken, he said. "We encourage that diversity. In Toronto we celebrate each of our heritages, our cultures and our different religious beliefs."

Young listed freedom of expression, freedom of the press, freedom of religion and an open justice system as Canadian values that form the "bedrocks of our civilization, and they're shared by other nations. We have the ballot box, the jury box and indeed the newspaper box to distinguish us. These are very important treasures."

In light of the recent atrocities, nothing short of our freedom is under attack, said Young. "I say to you as chief law officer of this province [that] we will assist in every way possible our American brothers and sisters in their time of need." He also stated that Canada has absolutely no place for intolerance, hatred or mindless vigilantism and pledged to "vigorously utilize" criminal laws and hate laws.

Romem conveyed sympathy to the victims of the attack. "We encourage the United States to go on and fight against terrorism," he added.

Israel knows the phenomenon well, he said. "I hope that now people will stop criticizing the State of Israel for fighting terrorism."

He urged listeners to visit Israel, invest in Israel and – particularly for young people – to make aliyah.

Murderers' perverse logic

From the editor's desk

The dust was still settling from the suicide bombings 10 days earlier in New York and at the Pentagon when President George W. Bush spoke to the Congress of the United States, indeed, to the entire world, last Thursday.

Through the settling dust, the president painted a grim but clearly focused picture of the face of the evil that had perpetrated the atrocities.

That evil is radical, violent, Islamist fundamentalism. The details of its face trace the features of a leader like Osama bin Laden and his secretive network of killers, Al Qaeda.

As of this writing, no bill of indictment has yet been drawn specifically naming bin Laden definitively as the mastermind behind the Sept. 11 atrocities. But the evidence points overwhelmingly in his direction and on that basis Bush has decided to act.

Remarkably, though not surprisingly, there are still many commentators who attempt to diminish the culpability of the murderers for the mass murder they perpetrated on Sept. 11. These commentators prefer to find "reasons" for the hatred that inspired the murderers, as if any reason could justify the slaughter of nearly 7,000 non-combatant, civilian innocents. And that is quite apart from the substance of the reasons – usually spurious or only partially true, or sometimes even totally false, (the broad outline of which I commented upon in last week's column) – that are advanced.

But the unadorned truth is that the murderers are simply murderers who target entire societies of people for death for reasons only their perverse "logic" justifies.

A chilling and alarming account of the toxic atmosphere that evolves into the "classroom" in which that logic is taught and absorbed appears in the September issue of Commentary.

In an article entitled How Suicide Bombers Are Made, Fiamma Nirenstein, an Italian journalist reporting from Israel for La Stampa, writes about the "anti-Semitic propaganda that circulates in such abundance in the Arab world."

Nirenstein chronicles example after horrible example of outrageous calumnies being spread in the Arab world about Jews, Judaism, Israelis and Israel. She then draws the inescapable, disconcerting conclusion.

"The effect of this relentless vilification is not difficult to discern. In the Arab world, where countervailing sources of information about Jews and the Jewish State are rare to nonexistent, Israel has been transformed into little more than a diabolical abstraction, not a country at all but a malignant force embodying every possible negative attribute... As for Israelis themselves, they are seen not as citizens, workers, students, or parents but as the uniformed foot soldiers of that same dark force...

"From such hatred it is but a short step to incitement and acts of violence. Arab schools teach not just that Israel is evil, but that extirpating this evil is the noblest of callings. As a text for Syrian 10th graders puts it, 'The logic of justice obligates the application of the single verdict [on the Jews] from which there is no escape: that their criminal intentions be turned against them and that they be exterminated [emphasis added]'. In Gaza and the West Bank, textbooks at every grade level praise the young man who elects to become a shahid, a martyr for the cause of Palestine and Islam."

Michael Nesamov illustration
Osama bin Laden

The author points out how the teaching of rabid anti-Semitism characterizes the region's "moderate" regimes as well as its "most militant and totalitarian-minded regimes."

Her terse summation regarding the justification for hating Jews applies with equal vigour to those who seek a justification for the Sept. 11 murderers' hatred for America.

"If we have learned nothing else from the latest intifadah, it is that the Arab world's grievance against Israel has little to do with the minutiae of dividing up territory and political authority. It has to do instead with the entire Zionist project, with the very existence of a Jewish state in the Middle East."

President Bush was correct in identifying the enemy as the "radical network of terrorists and every government that supports them," and equally correct in having defined the goal as ensuring that "every terrorist group of global reach has been found, stopped and defeated."

In his column in the Globe and Mail last Saturday, Rex Murphy, in typically concise and neatly sculpted style, placed the Sept. 11 events in their proper context.

"The security of its citizens is a nation's first virtue. The response to those who appropriate the 'right' to mass slaughter had to be unequivocal.

"George Bush had it right. As between terrorism and democracy, there's no room on this planet for both of us."

I concur.

Canada weighs counter-terrorism measures

By RON CSILLAG
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Community officials are confident a bill before the House of Commons that would criminalize fund-raising for terrorist groups will exclude the raising of money and aid to Jewish settlers and facilities across the so-called Green Line.

Previous to the Sept. 11 terror attacks in the United States, there had been concern that Bill C-16, which sought to strip charitable status from groups that raise money for terrorist organizations, would lead to problems for Jewish groups that raise funds for settlers, yeshivot and social welfare agencies in Israel's post-1967 boundaries.

It was feared that Arab and Muslim groups would use the law to seek the de-registration of many Jewish charities in Canada.

But now, the measures proposed would go much further than simply preventing an organization from issuing tax receipts: It would make it a criminal offense to raise funds in Canada for terrorist groups.

Justice Minister Anne McLellan said last week it's not known yet whether Bill C-16 will stand on its own or be part of a broader counter-terrorism omnibus bill that could be introduced in the House of Commons in the next few weeks.

Bill C-16 is currently being studied by an all-party Commons finance committee, prior to second reading.

Ed Morgan, chair of Canadian Jewish Congress's Ontario region, said he's confident any law dealing with counter-terrorism would not target Jewish organizations, directly or indirectly.

"Canadians wouldn't buy that," Morgan said. "The events of Sept. 11 made clear what terrorism is. It has nothing to do with houses on a hill, but with demolition and murder."

He said Ottawa will clearly distinguish between acts of politics and acts of violence.

However, it would be "naive," he added, to think that domestic Arab and Muslim groups will not challenge the law on several fronts, including the argument that some Jewish organizations in this country channel funds to "extremist" Jewish groups in the post-'67 territories.

If that argument is ever raised, "we're ready to meet it," Morgan said.

The bill would primarily target social welfare agencies, clubs, houses of worship, or front organizations with innocuous-sounding names which supposedly raise money for humanitarian purposes. Because it would criminalize the transfer of money to terrorist groups, it should have a strong deterrent effect, believes Eric Vernon, CJC's legislative analyst in Ottawa.

Canada's spy agency, the Canadian Security Intelligence Service (CSIS), has said this country is an important source of funds, as well as a base of operations, for terrorist groups.

Ed Morgan

In 1998, CSIS said it was watching 50 organizations and some 350 individuals with suspected ties to terror groups, including those with links to Hamas and Hezbollah.

Last February, CJC called on the federal government to amend the Criminal Code and make it illegal to raise funds for groups declared to be terrorist. Currently, there's no law that expressly makes fund-raising for a terrorist group a criminal act.

McLellan said the bill will also bring Canada in line with the aims of the International Convention for the Suppression of the Financing of Terrorism, passed by the United Nations in 1999 and signed – but not yet ratified – by Canada.

Canada must "strike at the heart" of terrorist fund-raising capabilities, McLellan said. "Terrorism has a certain similarity to organized crime. What fuels it is money. And therefore what we have to do is strike at the ability of terrorist organizations to raise money."

Apart from Jewish fears that a bill to strip groups of their charitable status would cast too wide a net, other critics have pointed out that it's often hard to distinguish between supporting a political cause and supporting terrorism.

"The only groups that should get upset [by the bill] are groups that engage in terrorism," said Manuel Prutschi, CJC's national director of community relations. He said similar laws in the United States and Great Britain have not affected Jewish organizations.

He said he's confident that a counter-terrorism law would have "solid guarantees of due process."

Several government departments are contributing to Canada's counter-terrorism legislation, including justice, foreign affairs, national defence and immigration.

Meantime, an immigration bill before the Senate is expected to pass without amendments. Bill C-11, which contains measures to boost front-line security screening of refugee claimants and restrict appeals for those facing deportation, should be passed as is.

YMCA Web site linked to pro-Palestinian sites

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The World Alliance of YMCAs has responded to criticism that its Web site is pro-Palestinian by adding 38 links to new Web sites – only one of which might be considered a strong supporter of Israeli policy.

Twelve of the sites are designated as Palestinian organizations, while 10 are described as Israeli in origin. In addition, six Palestinian-Israeli organizations, five sites listed as women's organizations and five more U.S. organizations have been added to the World Alliance's Web site (www.ymca.int).

Of all the added sites, only the Jewish Virtual Library (www.us-israel.org), sponsored by the Jewish Federation of Greater Washington, can be considered unreservedly pro-Israel and critical of Palestinian policymakers.

Most sites listed as Israeli are highly critical of the Jewish state, with B'Tselem, a human rights group, and Peace Now, the best known. The others include The Other Israel, Not in My Name, Bat Shalom and The Arab Association for Human Rights, which pull no punches in attacking Israel.

Groups listed as Palestinian-Israeli are invariably highly critical of Israeli policy while the U.S. organizations listed include the American-Arab Anti-Discrimination Committee and Jewish Unity for Peace, both of which blame Israel for the Mideast conflict.

"It's unbelievable," said Harold Brief, vice-chair of international relations for Canadian Jewish Congress. "It's an absolute obscenity."

Brief has complained to YMCA Canada, a constituent member of the World Alliance. The Canadian group, in turn, was scheduled to discuss the updated Web site, and a possible Canadian response, at its board meeting last weekend.

Silvana Anania, director of international relations for YMCA Canada, said the Canadian group had earlier urged the World Alliance to present a more "balanced site.

"The World Alliance had agreed to make it more comprehensive and include other organizations and Web sites to present a more balanced Web site," she said.

Prior to the recent round of changes, the World Alliance's Web site index included a link titled Palestine, that offered surfers access to a single site, Badil, a "resource centre for Palestinian refugees & residency rights."

In addition, the site posted a controversial pro-Palestinian report on the intifadah, along with a disclaimer that the report didn't necessarily represent the views of World Alliance constituent members.

Now, the World Alliance's new Palestine/Israel link offers dozens of links to anti-Israel Web sites.

Brief said the changes made by the World Alliance are almost laughable.

"It's so sad, it's funny." Congress' complaint about the site seems to have backfired, with Web surfers now given access to even more anti-Israel forums, he said.

Afghans could be allies of the West: filmmaker

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Filmmaker Simcha Jacobivici has been to the Khyber Pass, the narrow gorge that links Afghanistan and Pakistan. He's sat with the Pathan people of Afghanistan and been embraced by them as a brother. And he has a word of advice for the U.S.-led coalition out to punish the Taliban, Afghanistan's radical Islamic party, for harbouring Saudi-born terrorist Osama bin Laden.

"I think the Pathans could be allies of the West, not enemies," he said. "They're being approached as hostile Muslims when what they are is closet Israelites."

Jacobivici's fascinating claim, that the Pathans are really descendants of the 10 lost tribes of Israel forced into exile by Assyrian invaders in 722 BCE, was first made by him in a documentary film, Quest for the Lost Tribes, about two years ago. It is his contention that the Pathans, who call themselves Pushtuns, still maintain some fragile links to their ancient heritage, and are, in fact, the Jews' long-lost, distant cousins.

Travelling through central Asia like a filmmaking Indiana Jones, Jacobivici found that the Pushtuns consist of a collection of clans who have maintained a few ancient Judaic practices and who, in private, will acknowledge their links to the ancient Israelite kingdom.

Some of those ancient practices help explain recent history, Jacobivici contends. The Pushtun, who also call themselves Bani Yisrael (Children of Israel) consist of a number of clans whose names reflect their ancient lineage. The Gadun correspond to the tribe of Gad, the Efriti to Efraim, and the Shinwari to Shimon.

Though Muslims, they follow a local code called Puchtuwali that takes precedence over Shariah, Islamic law.

That manifested itself recently when the Taliban destroyed two massive Buddhist statues despite worldwide outrage and in the face of Muslim entreaties not to do so.

Filmmaker Simcha Jacobovici (centre) with a cameraman and an armed escort in the Khyber Pass.

The destruction of the statues, in keeping with a harsh interpretation of the biblical injunction to shun graven images, was accompanied by a massive animal sacrifice of 100 bulls as a sin offering, Jacobivici said. They felt they had sinned by tolerating the statues for as long as they did.

Even their hospitality to Osama bin Laden, fingered as the mastermind behind the World Trade Center bombings and the attack on the Pentagon, has echoes in ancient biblical practice, Jacobivici said.

In ancient times, Moses commanded the people of Israel to establish five cities of refuge, where those guilty of accidental killing could flee temporarily to avoid revenge attacks. The Taliban have offered bin Laden a similar area of refuge, in part in gratitude for his support in their war against the Soviet Union, he said.

There are other vestiges of ancient Israelite practice in Pathan culture, he continued. Until recently, most Pushtuns circumcised their boys on the eighth day, much earlier than other Muslims; the name, Afghan, is said by the Pathans to be the same as one of the sons of King Saul, Israel's first king; Saul's full name was Saul Ben Kish, and Kish is still a common boy's name in Afghanistan; the country's Suleiman Mountains are named after Israel's King Solomon; Pathans followed a tradition of lighting candles on Friday night, the onset of the Sabbath; Pathan men wrap themselves in a shawl that resembles a tallit (prayer shawl); and Kabul is the same name as one of the Canaanite cities conquered by Joshua.

Circumstantial evidence, to be sure, but convincing to Jacobivici.

Jacobivici, whose latest film, The Struma, will be featured in a gala screening at the Princess of Wales Theatre on Nov. 13, believes the Taliban and bin Laden part company in their attitude to the Western world. The Taliban, he said, are "not ideologically committed to bring down the West.

"The Taliban are not in the business of promoting Islam around the world." Groups like Islamic Jihad, Hezbollah and Hamas are working to create an Islamic empire and Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is supporting them.

"The centre for this virus is the Palestinian Authority," he added. "They've given a semblance of legitimacy for all these groups and allowed Islamic Jihad and Hamas to develop suicide bombings and legitimized it in the Muslim world.

"Bin Laden is the bee," he concluded, "Arafat is the hive."

Arafat, a national disaster for his people

One year ago, on Sept. 28, Yasser Arafat set back, by incalculable measurements, the course of the Palestinian people's progress toward an independent state. He let loose on the Temple Mount his band of youthful brigands to rain rocks and stones on Jewish worshippers below and thus set in motion a terrible train of events that became known as the second intifidah. It has lasted a year.

And even though Arafat was scheduled to meet this week with Shimon Peres to discuss – what? – a formula to get to a ceasefire to reach the Tenet recommendations to enable the parties to implement the Mitchell report to find a way back to the negotiating table to resume the Oslo peace process – there are no significant signs that the intifadah and its accompanying imposition of constant violence will end any time soon.

We know unequivocally, because his own deputies have publicly asserted it to be true, that the rioting that began on Sept. 28 was planned well in advance of that date. When then Opposition leader Ariel Sharon announced his intention to tour the Temple Mount, Arafat seized what he considered to be an opening to reverse the bad international press he had received for his refusal to sign an agreement with Ehud Barak. He reverted to the only "diplomatic" methodology with which he was truly comfortable: terror and violence.

He gave the signal; the mayhem began. Since Sept. 28 one year ago, there has hardly been a single day when violence has not been aimed at an Israeli, hardly a single day when an Israeli has not been injured or killed by Palestinians.

On Sunday, IDF Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz reported to the Knesset that since Sept. 28 of last year, there have been 8,000 serious attacks against Israel, 84 of them inside the Green Line. As a result of these attacks, 176 Israelis have been killed, 71 of them by various Palestinian security agencies under the direct control of Arafat himself. A total of 1,742 Israelis have been injured in the attacks, 1,251 of whom have been civilians. But in keeping with Arafat's well-documented disdain for human life, even for the lives of his own people, the physical toll of the second intifadah has been far higher on the Palestinians themselves than on Israelis: 604 Palestinians have been killed, and between 8,500 and 10,000 injured.

Then again, that toll was part of Arafat's plan. He knew Palestinian violence would be met by superior Israeli force. In fact he was counting on it. For the images of armed Israeli troops facing "stone-throwing" rioters, broadcast around the world, were, in the main, a public relations bonanza for him.

But absent the ephemeral public relations gain, Arafat's plan may well prove a permanent, national disaster for his people. The vast majority of Israelis regard him as neither reliable, nor viable, as a partner for peace.

Opposes Syria on Security Council

Canada should not vote in favour of Syria's nomination to the UN Security Council next month. It is fully aware that Syria still remains on the U.S. State Department's list of states sponsoring terrorism. Syria continues to provide safe haven and support to at least 10 of the over 30 designated terrorist organizations, including Hezbollah, Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

These terrorist organizations share a vision of global jihad against pro-western non-Islamic regimes, especially the United States, and call for the destruction of Israel. Who knows which of these groups supported by Syria participated in the carnage in New York City and Washington?

Not only did Syria ignore UN Security Council Resolution 520 in 1983 that called on all foreign forces to withdraw from Lebanon, but it also expanded its areas of occupation. Lebanon has lost its independence and southern Lebanon has been turned into an international terror base.

Syria continues to use military force and brutal oppression against its own minorities. In 1982, 20,000 Sunni Muslims were slaughtered when they rose up against Hafez Assad. Thirteen thousand political prisoners were killed between 1980 and the late 1990s. Until recently, Syria's Jews were forbidden to emigrate. Many were imprisoned and tortured.

The UN Security Council has primary responsibility for the maintenance of international peace and security. If Syria, a country involved in the drug and counterfeiting trades, continues to violate the rights of its own people and the Lebanese people, to support terrorist groups and to violate UN resolutions, how can it be expected to be an honourable and productive member of the Security Council?

Israel's painful choices

Israeli political analyst Yitzhak Sokoloff recently argued that if the international community were better informed of the virulent brain-washing of young Palestinians, they would hold the Palestinians more accountable for terrorists acts against Israelis.

Sokoloff is right on this point, but when he says that Israel cannot enter into negotiations until it has a worthy partner, he may have to wait a long time – time which is not on Israel's side. If he is right about the power of brainwashing, the next generation of Palestinians will be even more anti-Israeli than this one. What will Israel do when the area's current population of four million Palestinians and five million Israeli Jews is eclipsed by the Palestinians' higher birth rate?

Israel's choices are painful. Giving up the West Bank – even if it were doable at this time – is risky. The last line of Israeli withdrawal could well become the first line of attack by the Palestinians. However, defending Jewish settlements against increasingly well-armed Palestinian militias may be even more risky. Retaliation against terrorism, while justified, cannot be a viable long-term strategy.

If Israel wants to win the "information battle," it must return to negotiations. If the Palestinians again refuse to make peace, they will lose international support. If they do enter into negotiations, no Jew need be deluded that they have surrendered plans for the "liberation of all Palestine." But the Palestinians will not be the first people to find that their "grand destiny" is both unrealizable and unsustainable. And Israel will have an internationally accepted border from which it will more effectively be able to defend the Jewish State.

Conference of neo-Nazis?

Hijacking planes did not advance the Palestinian cause nor will the hijacking of the United Nations Conference on Racism. Israel will never be brought to its knees by terror nor by hateful and dishonest resolutions. What is frightening is that 3,000 non-government organizations in 44 caucuses from 153 countries could support anti-Semitism with such itensity that has not been seen since the '30s in Nazi Germany. One would have thought this was a conference of neo-Nazis or the Arab League.

In acts sanctioned by Yasser Arafat, innocent men, women and children are murdered and maimed for the simple reason that they are Jews. The leadership that condones suicide bombers must be eliminated either by force or by enlightened Palestinians who respect the sanctity of human life.

Surely, there are Palestinians who realize that the Barak peace proposal was fair and just for both sides. Instead of wasting time and energy maligning Israel and the Jews of the world, the UN should pass a resolution implementing the Barak proposal. It had the courage and honesty to do so in 1948 with the creation of the State of Israel and it would regain some moral authority by mandating the Barak solution now.

Jewish dignity at stake

I have a question for World Jewish Congress, B'nai Brith and all other Jewish organizations.

Does the persecution of, and discrimination against, the Jewish people at the hands of Christian and Muslim nations for hundreds of years qualify as crimes against humanity? If the answer is yes, then the pertinent historical documents should be compiled and delivered to Mary Robinson and associates at the UN.

At stake here is Jewish dignity.

Reflections on Yom Kippur

By RABBI IRWIN E. WITTY

Yom Kippur brings with it a variety of themes to be explored. Three areas in our tradition which relate to this Day of Atonement are especially worthy of reflection.

The period between Rosh Hashanah and Yom Kippur is known as the Ten Days of Repentance. The laws of tshuvah (repentance), though outlined in the Talmud, are codified in exemplary fashion in Maimonides' Mishne Torah. In these laws, we are instructed that repentance is a process between man and his God, and is an exercise in self-discipline. Not only is the Jew forced to take account of his past wrongdoings, confess his sins, and express remorse over having committed them, but he is expected to resolve never in the future to repeat his wayward actions.

Our rabbis taught that even the most righteous individual, a tzaddik gamur, cannot compare to the true penitent. In Judaism, the idea of man's mistakes piling up without hope of erasure does not exist. The past can be cancelled by a true cry from the heart to God and a return to His law and teachings, no matter how sinful the life one has led. This holds true not only during the days of awe and repentance, but at any time – even to the last hour of one's life.

Herman Wouk, my former professor at Yeshiva University and renowned novelist, relates in his only work of non-fiction, This Is My God, that his grandfather had a lodger in his Bronx (New York) apartment who was far less learned than his grandfather but much fiercer in piety.

One day, when Wouk and his grandfather were studying together the laws of repentance, the lodger burst from his room. "What!" he exclaimed. "The atheist guzzles whiskey and eats pork and wallows with his women all his life long, and then repents the day before he dies and stands guiltless? While I spend a lifetime trying to please God?"

Wouk's grandfather pointed to the book open before them. "So it is written," the patriarch said gently.

"Written?" The lodger roared. "There are books and there are books!" And he slammed the door as he returned to his room.

Wouk comments that "the lodger's outrage seemed highly logical," as it would to most of us. But he goes on to transmit a simple teaching he heard from his grandfather, namely, that cancelling the past does not turn it into a record of achievement. It leaves a blank, a waste of "spilled years." A man had better return, our tradition tells us, while time remains to write a life worth scanning at the end of one's days.

Since no man knows the day of his death, the time to get a grip on one's life is the very first moment when the impulse for change and improvement strikes. The postponement of repentance – that is, the avoidance of an imposition of self-discipline and return to Jewish observance, is, to the mind of any reasonable person, foolish.

Counting on the saving power of Yom Kippur to offer repentance, even as one continues merrily with wrongdoing, is to our sages both ineffectual and absurd. If Yom Kippur teaches us anything, it is not only about "returning," but having the fortitude of doing so without delay.

In the synagogue of the eastern European shtetl, an unusual custom was observed on the eve of Yom Kippur. Before Kol Nidrei was to be chanted, Jews arrived early, many to don the kittel, the white robe worn on the sacred day, and all of the men to wrap themselves in a tallit, the prayer shawl not normally worn for an evening service, except for on Kol Nidrei night. Prior to the service, every congregant would approach his fellow worshippers and ask for forgiveness, on the real possibility, or imagined prospect, that the individual had, some time during the year, offended a fellow worshipper.

Jewish tradition maintains that Yom Kippur provides atonement for the sins one has committed against one's Creator. But wrongs perpetrated against one's fellow man can only be expunged when one approaches the offended party and enters with him, or her, a plea for forgiveness.

And so each worshipper would move from person to person, and in a hushed tone, say to his neighbour: "Zeit mir moichel – Please forgive me."

The person to whom it was addressed would listen attentively to the declaration and would reply: "Ich bin dir moichel – I forgive you."

Immediately after this response, the respondent would assume the role of pleader and address the identical plea of forgiveness to the person he had just forgiven.

The entire house of worship became, for a substantial period of time, a beehive of whispering couples. Even the rabbi would join in the exchange of pleas and responses. Bitter enemies would approach each other on this sacred occasion, and if the two antagonists refused to draw near, a neutral third party of mutual acquaintance would intervene and almost bodily compel one or the other to take the initiative.

By the time the cantor began to chant the Kol Nidrei, all rifts may not have been healed, but sharp antagonisms had been assuaged and lesser conflicts ended. When order and silence was restored to the house of worship, many a pain had been relieved and many a burden had been lifted.

This practice is one that reveals a sensitivity of soul found rarely in the folklore of ancient or modern societies. But more significantly, it constitutes a dramatic illustration of the Jewish emphasis on cultivating the ability of asking and granting forgiveness, difficult though these are.

Many congregations in Israel and in Diaspora communities still hold on to this practice. It deserves to be adopted even more widely. How many hurts and upsets would be overcome by just declaring "Zeit mir moichel"?

It is difficult to explain why Jews, over a period of centuries, have elevated Kol Nidrei eve to a status exceeding in importance Yom Kippur itself. At first thought, the text of Kol Nidrei itself could not be the reason, for what it consists of is a declaration of the annulment of vows. What it proclaims is that all personal vows, oaths, or devotions that one has undertaken unwillingly, rashly, or unknowingly during the course of the year (and that, consequently, cannot be fulfilled), should be considered null and void.

Because Kol Nidrei contains the phrase that "all vows, promises, obligations, oaths we have sworn shall be annulled, made void and of no effect," anti-Semites have frequently taken the prayer as evidence that the oath of the Jew is worthless.

Indeed, according to some sources, there have been Jews who, basing themselves in ignorance on the Kol Nidrei, have taken their obligations carelessly.

But the assertions of those who have exploited Kol Nidrei, whether Jew or anti-Semite, are nonsense. Jewish society, rooted in the Halachah (Jewish law), has viewed one's plighted word, one's oral commitment, as having the same force and degree of sanctity as accorded a written contract.

It has been understood that the vows and obligations of which we speak in Kol Nidrei do not refer to promises we make to others, or regarding others, but of vows and obligations which one imposes upon onself. Vows and oaths taken with regard to another person are unbreakable, except when the person concerned is present and gives his consent.

There are those who contend, based upon a theory propounded in 1917 by Joseph S. Bloch, that Kol Nidrei came about as an absolution of vows that made it possible for Jews who were forced to profess Christianity – Marranos, as they were called – to rejoin the congregation of Israel on Yom Kippur.

Unfortunately, as romantic and appealing as this theory is, it does not square with the facts, since Kol Nidrei appears to antedate Christian persecutions. Moreover, it doesn't account for the adoption of Kol Nidrei in countries and communities which were free from coerced conversion.

It appears that, as troubling as the idea may be to a modern, the explanation offered by our Jewish mystics of the Kol Nidrei text and its extraordinary and haunting melody may be the most attractive. According to them, the speaker in Kol Nidrei is not man, but God Himself. Again and again in the course of Jewish history, the Almighty was forced to swear that He would do away with the people of Israel. Were it not for Moses' frantic interventions, in biblical times, He would have carried out His intent. Over the centuries, the provocations have been many.

And so, on Yom Kippur eve, we, the people of Israel, imitate Moses. We recite the words of Kol Nidrei, putting them, in a manner of speaking, in God's mouth so that He may feel Himself absolved of His oath to destroy His people. If, then, God is regarded as the speaker in the Kol Nidrei, we can understand why the dry formula of Kol Nidrei has taken on as important a position on Yom Kippur eve as it has. For as God contemplates the coming year and sees our deeds and misdeeds, He prays, so to speak, with words that we have put into His mouth that He be absolved of His rash vows to do away with us.

On Yom Kippur eve, then, it is God Himself – not the cantor, the choir or the rabbi – who begins the service, and what He says, in effect, is: by your repentance, by your commitment to My Torah, through worship, through your fulfilment of mitzvot and carrying out good deeds, seek Me – and live.

In this, as in so many instances, the mystical and seemingly irrational interpretation is one that appears to have the ring of truth and one which enlightens us about the age-old "mystery" of why Kol Nidrei occupies the exalted position in our Yom Kippur service that it does.

Opinions

A dearth of rabbis

There is a serious problem in the Jewish world that we need to face. North American Jewish life suffers from a dearth of rabbis, and the number of congregations that cannot obtain rabbinic guidance is growing. I understand that the Catholic Church has a similar problem but that, alas, is little consolation. I do not know what its major problem is, but I have some idea why fewer and fewer young Jewish men and women decide to make the rabbinate their life's profession.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

It was recently my dubious privilege to look at the job description of a mid-sized congregation. It stated in effect that the rabbi was to be in charge of the congregation in every respect, which to put it plainly, involved not only spiritual and educational but also physical tasks, amongst them the proper maintenance of the building as well as congregational finances. Theoretically, these responsibilities should belong to lay committees, but all too often volunteers are also in short supply, and so it is left to the rabbi to pick up the slack.

Obviously, the rabbi's workday cannot simply fit a 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. time span. Rabbinic responsibilities arise without respect to date or time, and while all the rabbis I know are aware of their responsibilities, a good many of them do not have the mental and physical stamina to fulfil the expectations of their employers.

It pains me to report that increasing numbers of my colleagues are suffering from burnout. They have had to seek medical help and more and more take early retirement. The pressure is becoming too large, their time with their own families is too brief. In short, they cannot fulfil ever-growing expectations of multiple kinds. As a result, this pressure scares off those who might be candidates for the profession.

There was a time when rabbis were supposed to be primarily scholars. Nowadays unfortunately, the level of rabbinic scholarship is usually of little interest to the congregation. There are of course exceptions, but they are too few. The respect for Jewish knowledge among congregants has been overshadowed by so-called practical questions. While these of course do have their place, they should not have the dominant spot on the agenda. The secret of Jewish survival is more than a well-functioning congregational organization – it is a good level of knowledge. To achieve that, rabbis have their work cut out for them, and they will do it gladly, as long as it is not alloyed with a multitude of extraneous tasks.

The balance sheet

In my mind, I have written this column three times in the last several weeks. First, there was the year-end column, looking at Israel's balance sheet after a year-long intifadah. Next, there was the post-Durban column, looking at the balance sheet of friends and foes for Jews the world over. But today, it is the column after Sept. 11, the day on which this generation in the free world faced the reality of evil as never before.

Shira Herzog in Toronto

There are some common threads to all three columns. In the midst of the colossal human tragedies that have unfolded and the endless streams of analysis that have flowed, I want to reflect on some truths that may be a bit closer to home.

There are two poles that define the outside parameters of the debate.

On the one side, there is the unacceptable argument that views the terrorism that destroyed the symbols of American economic and military might as a product of political grievances and differences over American policy, especially in the Middle East. Therefore, this argument goes, those grievances have to be addressed as a remedy. There can, indeed, be differences over U. S. policy, and some of its critics may even be correct, but a reductionist argument that simplifies both the cause and effect of those brutal attacks is both incorrect and counterproductive.

On the other side, there is the unacceptable tendency to dehumanize all Muslims and Arabs, and to see in the events in New York and Washington a vindication of such prejudice. While there are violent interpretations of Islamic teachings and Arabs who support them, to engage in blanket condemnation of a religion and people is to lose sight of the thoughtfulness and discerning reason that define us as human beings and Judaism as a religion. We cannot stoop to the level of our adversaries.

The space between these two poles is where we grieve, empathize, analyze the options for prudent reaction, and where we will hopefully reach the appropriate conclusions as individuals, communities and nations. And within this space, there are some apparent contradictions that reflect the complexities of the tough reality we face today:

One can support Israel and its actions to protect its citizens against the perpetrators of terrorism, and at the same time strive for a political agreement that will result in a Palestinian state alongside Israel. The status quo is untenable and a military solution alone is not possible.

One can reject the outrage at Durban and criticize the hypocrisy of too many governments and NGOs, while recognizing that we had friends there – in both groups. And one can regret the fact that our own government chose to stay till the bitter, disappointing end, while commending the strong stand Canada took against the blatant criticism of Israel in the conference's final declaration.

One can cry foul at the singling out of Israel that made it impossible to discuss real grievances and racist policies, and at the same time, admit that Israel has made mistakes, like any other country in the free world.

We can recognize our enemies, and respond to them with force and fortitude, without retreating into an insular, self-defeating "us" versus "them" posture. The extremism of Durban and the zealous hatred that led to the brutal attacks in the United States demonstrate that neither Israel nor Jews are the sole targets of this hatred. We should endeavour to broaden the base of understanding and the sense of a shared threat and common values among people of goodwill. We must fight the fanatics and their sponsors politically, economically and militarily, but also engage moderates and reason with them, and seek the opportunity for dialogue wherever possible. The alternative is too awful, and we have seen it.

Finally and importantly, when it comes to Israel, let's move beyond the rhetoric of solidarity and the negativism of how bad it is, and try to figure out what we can actually do – each in our own way. More than anything else, Israelis are trying to get on with their lives and to maintain a good, vibrant, liberal society in the face of constant pressure and the security imperative. Our job is to actively help them do so, whichever way we can. More on this to come.

We are all Americans

I write this just three days after the terrorist attacks on the United States. By the time this column is read, much may have changed. There is a reasonable probability that another major terrorist attack may have taken place. Most observers assume there are other terrorist cells lying in wait. It is also likely that an American military response may be underway. In fact, anything is likely. Things can change by the hour, let alone daily. But certain things are clear.

Morton Weinfeld in Montreal

First, Canada has changed, for the better, when it comes to protecting the rights of minorities in times of stress. Recall the internment and relocation of Japanese Canadians after Pearl Harbor. Canada moved, even before the Americans, on their Japanese population. Not one single Japanese Canadian was ever charged, let along convicted, of any act of sabotage or treason. Yet the government acted against the Japanese, and enjoyed the overwhelming support of most sectors of Canadian society. There was no entrenched tradition of civil liberties to help protect them.

Today, a different situation exists. True, there is not a classic war situation. But there have been horrific acts of terror directed against Americans, with additional perpetrators likely present. Government leaders and the media as well, reflecting educated opinion, have been concerned to avoid a general backlash against Muslim or Arab communities in North America. While there are indeed troubling individual acts of racist anger, there is no support for government action against law-abiding Arab or Muslim Canadians. That is progress.

Second, Israel and the Middle East will become more central to North American public discourse. Opponents of Israel will try to drive a wedge between the United States and Israel, and North American Jews will be caught in the crossfire. People will argue that if only America would stop supporting Israel, terrorists would stop targeting American citizens.

But this has been tried before. Recall that during the oil crisis after the Yom Kippur War, enemies of Israel made concerted efforts to blame Israel for America's economic woes. It didn't work. America stood by Israel, and there was no rise in anti-Semitism. My sense is that these tragic events will bond America – and one hopes Canada – and Israel closer together.

The sad truth is that many of the Muslim or Arab voices in the Middle East that lament, in public at least, this latest act of terror, endorse similar acts when directed at Israelis. Indeed, they rejoice. A recent poll found that three quarters of West Bank respondents supported the actions of suicide bombers in Israel.

Yet earlier polls in the West Bank, before the new intifadah, found much higher support for the peace process. This suggests that attitudes among the Palestinians can be influenced by events. While we Jews support a tough response against terrorists and their sponsors, and while many hold deep suspicions of current Palestinian leaders, we can still hope for an eventual accommodation with the Palestinian people.

Third, this tragedy has driven home to me just how fragile our lives are, and how lucky my generation of Canadian Jews has been. I compare myself to my father. He was born in Galicia, in what is now Ukraine, in 1902. He lived directly through two world wars waged in his own backyard, as well as the Depression. He was raised in a thoroughly anti-Semitic society. He was an officer in the Polish army. He survived the Holocaust in Poland. He twice lived under Communist regimes. He migrated twice, once to Canada and thirty years later to Israel.

Compared to that, my life has been a picnic. My generation of Canadian Jews has experienced almost no anti-Semitism. I personally have never had to confront war in any form, not even a draft to evade or obey. We take affluence and security and tolerance for granted.

That is now over. Try as we might, we Canadian Jews – like other Canadians – will perhaps now have to confront history – and specifically Jewish history – head on. We are no longer bystanders, leaving Americans, American Jews or Israelis, to bear the brunt of the struggle. Canadians have been smug and Canadian Jews have been lucky. But many of us have family or friends affected by the attacks. We are all Americans. Shanah Tovah and a G'mar Tov.

The Kirshner File

A year later, the Palestinian uprising drags on

A year after the eruption of the second Palestinian uprising, Israelis are digging in their heels, mindful of a sombre assessment by Gen. Shaul Mofaz – the Israeli army's chief of staff – that the Palestinian Authority (PA) has prepared for a drawn-out conflict.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

Mofaz's analysis, however, may yet be overtaken by events. In the wake of the Sept. 11 terrorist bombings in New York City and Washington, D.C., the United States pressured the PA and Israel to abide by a ceasefire. But within hours, it appeared to be in tatters, having been repeatedly violated by Palestinians.

In the immediate aftermath of the World Trade Center and Pentagon bombings, Israel completely abandoned its policy of restraint and sharpened its offensive against the PA. Israeli tanks and bulldozers rolled into Jenin, Jericho and Ramallah in Area A (fully controlled by the PA), and Israel unveiled plans for a new buffer zone stretching from Jenin to Tulkarem. On Sept. 18, following Yasser Arafat's announcement of a ceasefire, Israel suddenly suspended its offensive.

No one will be surprised if the current truce breaks down yet again. In the past year, there have been several attempts by Israel and outside parties to defuse the intifadah. Ehud Barak tried but failed to persuade Arafat to lay down his arms. Shimon Peres has not fared much better. Joschka Fischer, Germany's foreign minister, convinced Arafat to accept a truce after the June 1 suicide bombing in Tel Aviv which killed 21 Israelis, but it collapsed in a hail of bullets. In vain, envoys from the European Union, Russia, Egypt, Jordan and Turkey have also attempted to quell the uprising.

Yasser Arafat

George Tenet, the director of the U.S. Central Intelligence Agency, forced a ceasefire on Arafat on June 13, but it never took root. Hopes of defusing the crisis seemed to vanish in midsummer, when Palestinian militants angrily abrogated the phantom truce after Israel liquidated two Hamas leaders in Nablus, seized Orient House – the PA's unofficial headquarters in eastern Jerusalem – and closed the PA governor's residence in Abu Dis.

So the uprising, which defies a military solution, was still simmering last week, consuming Israeli and Palestinian lives, wreaking havoc on Israel and the PA's economy, destroying what remains of the battered and perhaps irredeemable Oslo peace process, and bolstering the popularity of Hamas and Islamic Jihad.

The intifadah, which broke out after Ariel Sharon, the current prime minister, visited the disputed Temple Mount in the company of some 1,000 Israeli policemen, is far more serious than the previous uprising (1987-93), both in intensity and scope.

The Palestinians are infinitely better armed. Slingshots, rocks, knives and firebombs have given way to Kalashnikovs, anti-tank weapons, mortars, grenades and a plague of suicide bombers. Israel, for its part, has deployed surface-to-surface missiles, tanks, artillery, Apache helicopter gunships and F-16 fighter jets. Given the array of heavy weaponry, the casualties on both sides are considerably higher and the anger and bitterness runs deeper and wider.

This time around, the violence has spilled out of the West Bank and the Gaza Strip into Israel itself. Numerous Israeli civilians have been killed, targeted by Hamas and Islamic Jihad terrorists, who have succeeded in creating a climate of fear and uncertainty.

Arab states have taken a tougher line toward Israel. Egypt recalled its ambassador. Jordan, the only other Arab country to have signed a peace treaty with Israel, has kept its newly-appointed envoy to Tel Aviv in Amman. Morocco, Tunisia, Oman and Katar suspended low-level ties with Israel.

The uprising has gone through several stages, from a rock throwing phase by Palestinian civilians to pitched battles between Israel and the PA.

The first stage, which came on the heels of Sharon's politically inspired and needlessly provocative visit to the Temple Mount on Sept. 28, took the form of conventional anti-Israel demonstrations. They quickly degenerated into a low-grade war of attrition.

The protests were supposedly spontaneous grassroots expressions of rage and frustration over Israel's occupation, the wretched and humiliating conditions Palestinians endure and the failure of the Camp David summit. Israel believes that the intifadah was premeditated and that Sharon's visit was merely a pretext.

What, in fact, is the truth?

In an unguarded moment, a PA minister admitted it was planned. It sounds like a plausible explanation. Since 1967, the Palestinians have violently resisted Israel's presence in the West Bank and Gaza. On the eve of the Camp David summit, Palestinian officials warned that all hell would break loose if negotiations failed and the occupation continued.

For Arafat, the intifadah serves another important purpose. It distracts attention from the growing perception that the PA is corrupt, disregards the rule of law and is ineffectual in improving the abysmal standard of living.

The Sharm el-Sheik Fact-Finding Committee, chaired by former U.S. senator George Mitchell, absolved Arafat of planning the uprising: "We have no basis on which to conclude that there was a deliberate plan by the PA to initiate a campaign of violence."

Yezid Sayigh, a Palestinian historian, has written that Arafat had "no prior strategy based on the use of force."

True or not, the fact of the matter is that Arafat has never hesitated to harness violence to suit his needs, a flagrant breach of the Oslo accords.

On March 13, 1996, at a conference in Sharm el-Sheik, he promised "to uproot (terrorism) from our land, because our dream of freedom and independence and self-determination cannot bear fruit and be realized in a sea of blood and tears."

Despite his rhetoric, Arafat has exploited violence to wrest political concessions from Israel so that he can establish a sovereign state in the West Bank and Gaza, with eastern Jerusalem as its capital.

A student of history, he knows that violence in the Mideast pays.

The 1936-39 Arab Revolt in Palestine prompted the British to restrict Jewish immigration and land sales. The 1973 Yom Kippur War compelled Israel to give up the Sinai and a sliver of the Golan Heights. The first intifadah sowed the seeds of the Oslo process, with its Israeli territorial withdrawals. Hezbollah forced Israel to retreat from southern Lebanon.

Having been inspired by Hezbollah's example, the Palestinians launched the second phase of the intifadah last October, shortly after two Israeli reservists were brutally murdered in Ramallah, a defining moment. These murders opened the floodgates. Barak, having lost his faith in Arafat as a partner, ordered helicopters to bombard PA buildings. In effect, he declared war on the PA.

The situation worsened when Palestinian gunmen and mortar crews commenced firing on Jewish settlements and army posts in the territories and in Israel.

Last November, Hamas ushered in a deadlier phase when it planted a car bomb in Jerusalem, the blast of which killed the daughter of a prominent Israeli politician. Since then, Islamic fundamentalist suicide bombers have imposed a reign of terror on Israelis.

Much to Israel's distress, the last bomber, Mohammed Shaker Habishi, was an Israeli Arab. In recent weeks, six Israeli Arabs have been arrested for planning suicide attacks. These developments conjure up the bleak spectre of a fifth column in Israel.

Israel's decision to kill Palestinian militants, starting with Fatah leader Hussein Abayat last autumn, deepened the conflict as well. In the past 10 months, Israel has eliminated upwards of 50 such leaders, including the secretary general of the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine, Mustafa Zibri.

Along with this tactic, Israel mounted retaliatory raids into the Gaza Strip, Jenin, Hebron and Beit Jala, all in a bid to demoralize the PA and demolish buildings and uproot trees and shrubs concealing Palestinian positions. In three instances, after suicide bombings, Israel deployed F-16 fighter jets to hit PA targets. Israel targeted the PA because of its failure to crack down on Islamic radicals.

The fighting has hardened Israeli and Palestinian public opinion. Although most Israelis still broadly support peace negotiations and are ready for painful compromises in the interests of achieving a realistic political settlement, they generally back Sharon's military policy. In the face of Israeli measures to contain or crush the intifadah, the vast majority of Palestinians have been radicalized, and support suicide bombings.

It's clear that the spirit of Oslo is dead and is buried under the rubble of the intifadah.

"The Thirst Quencher"

One Yom Kippur a wealthy but miserly man approached the Sanzer Rebbe in a state of near collapse. After several spoonfuls of water, the man still claimed to be near death. "Very well," said the Rebbe, "but for every additional spoonful I allow you to drink, you must donate 100 coins to the poor." The wealthy man's thirst was suddenly quenched.

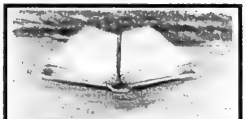
Appreciating all that God has provided

By RABBI JORDAN D. COHEN

We all feel so vulnerable now. Those simple acts that just a short while ago were commonplace now make us feel insecure and unsure. I used to get on and off airplanes with little more concern than I had when getting on and off a bus or subway. Now, just the sound of a jet overhead sends a chill down my spine. Now, I am not sure I want my feet to ever leave the ground. I know many people who have worked in high-rise office towers for years. Now, some tell me, they find themselves pausing to take a deep breath before entering the building. Just getting into an elevator is an act of faith.



Rabbinic Reflections

After the horrific events of Sept. 11, the commonplace is no longer so common. Our zones of comfort are not so comfortable anymore. We question the security of our own day-to-day activities. As has been said over and over again, everything has changed. The new question has become: how can we cope with this new prevailing sense of insecurity?

Such events may be unprecedented, yet our tradition has always guided us in how to cope with the unprecedented. In my evening prayers after the day the terror, I found myself drawn to the words of the Hashkiveinu. Recognizing the many fears that lie in every day life, this prayer implores the Eternal One "to guard our comings and goings, for life and for peace." With the approach of Sukkot in a few days, I found myself particularly drawn to this prayer's use of the image of the sukkah – Ufros Aleinu Sukkat Shlomecha – "Spread over us the sukkah of Your peace..."

There is a debate in the Talmud over the interpretation of the Torah verse that first introduces the sukkah: You shall live in huts seven days... in order that future generations may know that I made the Israelite people live in Sukkot when I brought them out of the Land of Egypt... (Lev. 23:24)

Rabbi Akiva interpreted this passage literally. He argued that the sukkot were the huts in which the Israelites lived while wandering in the wilderness. But Rabbi Eliezer read this passage metaphorically. He believed that the sukkot represented the Holy One's presence amongst the people, the clouds of glory that accompanied the Israelites in the wilderness.

According to our tradition, there were seven clouds that not only led Israel, but smoothed the way for them as well: one cloud on each side, one above to protect from sun and rain, one below to kill scorpions and level the ground, and one to lead the way. The path was not without its challenges and dangers, but it was the Divine Presence that helped shelter and protect and guide.

The sukkah represents the relationship between the Holy One and the people. It represents life itself. Like an actual sukkah, life can be both comforting and tenuous, both reassuring and vulnerable. As we huddle in the splendour of our shaky, temporary dwellings, we feel vulnerable. We are the mercy of all the elements, the realities of life, both natural and human.

Yet, as we glance over to our warm solid permanent homes standing only a few feet away, we can remember that this too shall pass. Hopefully, we can remember and appreciate, even for a moment, all that is good is this world, and all that God has provided.

Rabbi Cohen is associate director of Kolel – The Adult Centre for Liberal Jewish Learning.

Mideast reflections

Jerusalem Café

A tinkling of glass, an overhead fan,
And the sound of Ivrit,
That language of prayer brought into the street
And used for arguing, for ordering

Café au lait, for flirting, for complaining
About the intemperate weather, or Commenting on that suspicious one who's just Walked through the door. Think of all he will not hear

After the blast, like the raining down of fragments,
The stunned voice of a mother, the hysterical sirens
That confirm this did not happen elsewhere.
And the holy ones with tweezers are collecting

Bits of flesh for the purpose of burial, so out of chaos
There can be ritual, out of barbarity, solemnity.
The overhead fan is still working. Rescuers
Are shouting in the language of Genesis.

Palestinians

Rather than getting on with life
They choose poverty, squalor, endless strife.
Rather than giving peace a try
They prefer to say, "We're victimized."

Arafat

I am sure that with his dying breath
He'll say, "Continue, children, to be agents of death."

Dupe

He sees himself as long oppressed,
Straps explosives to his chest
While his leaders lie into the camera's lens,
Then drive off in their Mercedes-Benz.

Jewish Life

Sukkot & the Internet

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

"In sukkot you shall dwell, seven days... That your generations may know that in booths I made the children of Israel dwell when I brought them out of the land of Egypt." Leviticus 23:42 [http://bible.ort.org/books/torahd5.asp?action=displaypage& book=3&chapter=23&verse=41&portion=31]. With that we are commanded to perform one of the most joyous mitzvot in the Jewish calendar. Today, some sukkah lessons from the World Wide Web.

Learn about it: Whether you decide to start from scratch or want to buy a prefab sukkah, take a look at Ten Tips for Your Sukkah and while you're there check out the article explaining the hows and whys of building a sukkah [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/sukkot/]. Need more detail? The Mishnah explains that a sukkah built on top of a wagon or on the deck of a ship may be used on the holiday. A sukkah built on a treetop or the back of a camel is valid but may not be used on the festival. [http://www.torahcc.org/mishna/16700/sunday.htm].

Build it: If camels aren't a concern and if you like the smell of sawdust, then take a look a Gary Garb's Sukkah Building Instructions [http://www.chelm.org/jewish/chags/sukkot/build.html]. It seems that Rabbi David Klein is also a do-it-yourselfer but he opts for more exotic building materials as you'll see in his plans for a Bamboo Booth [http://www.uahc.org/congs/la/la002/bambsukh.html].

For anyone who is thinking of taking the easy way out and buying a pre-fab sukkah, read up on the trials and tribulations of Ellis Shuman: "'I want my money back,' I demanded on the phone to the salesman the next day. 'But it's so simple. Didn't you follow the instructions?' he retorted. 'What instructions?' I shouted."

Don't worry, things end happily for Ellis and his sukkah [http://israeliculture.about.com/library/weekly/aa092699.htm].

Decorate it: Once your sukkah is up, it's time to make it even more beautiful. Not only can you e-mail some lovely Sukkot greeting cards but you can also print them out to decorate your sukkah [http://greetz.com/sukkot/]. If you are looking for some international design inspiration, check out the gallery of sukkahs from Jerusalem to Hawaii [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/sukkos/succospictures.html].

Entertain in it: If you build it they will come. Who? In addition to your earthly guests, tradition holds that every sukkah is graced each night by a different tzaddik: Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and King David. Aish Hatorah has a very good page explaining the spiritual significance of Ushpizin [http://aish.com/holidays/sukkot/].

Eat in it: Sure there's always room for gefilte fish but if you want to broaden your holiday palate, take a look at the massive Jewish cuisine newsgroup archives [http://www.cyber-kitchen.com/rfcj/category.cgi?category=SUKKOT]. You can try out Kreplach with Shiitake Filling, Rodanchas de Kalvassa (Greek Pumpkin Coils), Sambusak (Egyptian Baked Meat Pie) and of course, Hearts of Lulav (Palm) Salad. If you're hungry for more, see the Jewish-Food Sukkoth Archives [http://www.jewish-food.org/recipes/sukindex.htm].

Learn from it: In When a House is Not Your Home, Rabbi Mendel Weinbach suggests that no matter how beautifully we decorate a sukkah, there's no mistaking that it's a temporary structure. From that we can learn about the transience of life [http://www.ohr.org.il/special/sukkos/].

Rabbi Weinbach tells the story of a traveller who once visited the Chafetz Chaim. "Where is your furniture?" asked the astonished visitor of the sage when he saw how barely furnished the room was. "And where is yours?" was the Chafetz Chaim's response. "I have no furniture with me because I am only passing through," explained the visitor. "I, too, am only passing through this world," said the Chafetz Chaim, "for our lives here are only a preparation for the real world, the World to Come. For merely passing through this corridor of time I have enough furniture."

Have a very happy holiday!

The shofar

By RACHAEL TURKIENICZ

Although you may be reading this a few weeks after the horrific terrorist events in the United States, I am writing this piece just a few days after them. Forgive me for not writing thoughts that are timely for the day you read this, but I am unable to project thoughts into the future; the present moment seems unending.

From within this moment I have asked whether there is a Jewish response to these events. Not a political response and certainly not the clear moral outrage that we all feel, but a vehicle that is Jewish to which I can turn to help me express and communicate. The image that fills my mind is the image of the shofar.

Jews around the world have listened to and heard the blasts of the shofar, but this year they seem more like outcries. Although rabbinic literature is filled with insights and explanations as to why we blow the shofar, there is one reason that seems appropriate to this time. Saadiah Gaon commented that among other reasons, one reason for blowing the shofar is the connection between the shofar (the ram) and the Genesis story of the binding of Isaac.

As Abraham is preparing to sacrifice Isaac, God stops him and shows him a ram caught by its horns (shofar) in the thickets. It is this ram that is sacrificed instead of Isaac. I see the ram in this story as the alternate solution.

We blow the shofar and we communicate our message to God. We invoke the precedent event of an ancestor to say to God that although some things are meant to be, sometimes alternatives can be found. God found another way to fulfil the request for a sacrifice, and the shofar is our plea to God to find alternative ways to fulfil Divine decrees.

The presence of the shofar accomplishes that connection, but the midrash in Leviticus connects the actual blasts to the event as well. According to this interpretation, Sarah has found out what is happening to her son and she has arrived at the base of the mountain. Believing she has arrived too late she begins to pour her soul into crying out to God. She screams and sobs in long wailing cries and short hyperventilated weeping.

We blow the shofar to mirror Sarah's screams. We communicate to God that we are human and frail and there are certain things we cannot endure.

As we combine both rabbinic images into one we see that the shofar and its blasts embody the first two Jewish people, Abraham and Sarah. But the imagery expands to include us all when the rabbis discuss the shape of the shofar.

In the Talmud, the rabbis comment that traditionally a shofar should be curved. This is to symbolize our personal bowing in submission to the Divine will. There are some customs that prefer the shofar pointed downward to accomplish the visual imagery of the bowing Jew.

This year, the shofar becomes my vehicle, my response. I look at the shofar and I see it is me. As always, we have no choice but to bow in submission to God's will. My sorrow at the enormous amount of human suffering and pain is embodied in the sounds I hear – the crying of a mother. I think of Abraham torn between his love for God and his son as I implore God to find another way to fulfil Divine decrees.

May this New Year bring health and peace for all of humanity.

Binder's sukkah panels represent the Land of Israel

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — When Sharon Binder made aliyah with her husband and children in 1983, the Judaica artist and calligrapher had never tasted a fresh fig. A neighbour greeted her, bearing the exotic fruit, and told her, "This is representative of us."

Binder agrees that fresh figs, which are currently in season and serve as one motif on the set of sukkah panels she created in the late 1990s, are very representative of the land of Israel. Why? Their juiciness, colour and richness, she explains.

Sharon Binder

The latter two attributes aptly describe her panels, which are on display at Beth Tzedec Congregation until the end of October.

It's a nice way to come back to the city, she said at the synagogue earlier this month, preparing for the exhibition opening that evening.

Binder's husband, Rabbi Robert Binder, who now works as a freelance writer and editor, served at Beth Tzedec for five years before becoming spiritual leader of Shaar Shalom Congregation prior to their aliyah.

Binder, a New Yorker who spent 11 years in Toronto, studied art history at the Hebrew University of Jerusalem for a year, completed a bachelor's degree in art at Queens College in New York, and furthered her studies in calligraphy at Seneca College and the Toronto Arts Guild.

"My love was lettering," said the mother of four and grandmother of one, recalling the ketubot and invitations she designed early in her career, some of which are on display in Jewish museums. Exhibits of her work have been held in Israel, England and North America.

Among her more notable pieces were commissions presented to the late Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Rabin and the late King Hussein of Jordan. The latter commission was an 80 by 60 cm water colour and gouache featuring a verse from the Tanach about "a house built on wisdom and...understanding."

Her sukkah panels (which can be viewed at www.sharonsukkah.com), depict the harvest symbols of the Land of Israel's seven species, as described in Deuteronomy: "A land of wheat and barley, of vines, figs, and pomegranates, a land of olive oil and of [date] honey..."

The set is linked by a sand-coloured background, representing the colour of the land, and a common motif, enhanced by biblical quotes appropriate to each species.

Binder also designed two accompanying panels, one representing the lulav and etrog, and the other the ushpizin (and the ushpizot, their less traditional female counterparts) – the symbolic biblical guests invited into the sukkah each night.

A limited number of sets and individual panels are available for sale. They take one to two weeks to ship from Israel, and start at $295 (US) for one panel.

The seven panels, measuring one by two m. each, are fitted with grommets for easy hanging and can be rolled up when not in use.

Binder's very first sukkah panels, with a different design, were a gift to her synagogue following the bat mitzvah of her daughter, who is now 26. Once they were in use, however, she realized that they would not last. "They kept fading, and I had to recolour them. I had to find something more permanent."

One of Binder's sukkah panels.

Her subsequent use of heavy canvas, acrylic paint and a final coat of acrylic clear finish made the artwork more durable, but Binder also wanted to find a way to make her work more accessible to more people.

She discovered that digital computerized printing "gave a wonderful colour effect" and reproduced the effect of the original watercolour and goauche in which she worked.

At first she used the new technology for other works, creating limited edition prints on high quality paper, but for the sukkah panels, she needed something more durable.

Ultimately, she approached a company that printed advertising billboards and – although they weren't quite sure what to make of her request – they went ahead and printed the panels on shimshonit, a plasticized canvas named for the strength of Samson.

The printing staff hung one of the panels as a permanent display, and Binder was likewise delighted with the result, which allowed her to paint a small original to be scanned at high resolution and blown up. "It's quite amazing," she said.

Zworth turns his dreams into a souper product

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

Neil Zworth has turned a dream idea into a souper product.

He is founder and president of Neil's Soup Kettle, a line of vegetarian, fresh, ready to serve soups. He is also the licensed producer of Catherine's antipasto and gourmet condiments. The products are certified kosher under KSA in Los Angeles, and are sold across Ontario.

A kosher chicken soup supervised under COR is manufactured in an outside plant because the Neil's Soup Kettle plant is pareve.

Zworth, who is partners with his cousin Marci Ruch, says the idea for a line of soups was born when he worked in marketing for Coca Cola foods.

"I saw a brand of soups in Vancouver that was sold in small bags and could stay fresh for three or four days. I wondered about making a branded product that is properly packed and could last longer in the refrigerator."

At that time, he says, there were no branded, fresh soups sold through supermarkets. "I saw the concept and I loved the idea; I just waited for the right opportunity.

In 1991, at age 32 and newly married, he decided he could not wait any longer. "I knew I could offer a product that is of benefit to people, and my wife, a family doctor, was very supportive.

"I worked on getting a label and packaging, and finally decided to package the soups in mason jars because that says home-made. I then tried to develop recipes using no preservatives and no MSG, which also had a good balance in terms of nutrients."

He was so driven to make it work, he says, he would try recipes "hundreds and hundreds of times. I wanted soups that were low in fat and high in flavour. I tested all the recipes at home; it was completely trial and error."

Among the first soups he developed were potato leek tomato, carrot and hot and sour. "Now, we have 15 varieties at any given time. Squash soup goes well in the fall, and gazpacho is perfect in the summer."

In 1999, Zworth began producing the Catherine line of products which includes cranberry sauce, various types of antipasto, jellies and wildflower honey.

Zworth and Ruch have recently moved the business from a 2,700-square-foot plant in Mississauga to a more than 7,700-square-foot plant in Etobicoke. "This expansion has allowed us to produce a larger volume of soups while maintaining the necessary quality control.

"Our products are ones that everyone would make at home if they had the time," Ruch says.

The pair remain active in developing recipes. "There has to be a certain level of taste, and we will not compromise. We have to have the right thickness and the right flavour; we decide what the soup would taste like if someone had three hours to produce it from scratch," says Ruch.

They are careful to keep the batch sizes to a certain size, she says, "if they are too large, it is difficult to maintain the home-made taste. Large batches are an impediment to quality and texture."

Zworth and Ruch offer the following recipes.

GINGERY CARROT SOUP

This thick, light tasting soup is excellent either as an appetizer or as a meal with a salad and crusty whole wheat bread.

2 lb. carrots
¼ cup chickpeas rinsed and drained
4 cups water
1 tbsp. olive oil
2 medium onions chopped
2 cloves garlic minced
1½ tbsp. minced ginger
¼ tsp. cumin
1 tbsp. lemon juice
freshly ground pepper to taste

Peel and chop carrots and place in medium sized pot with water. Cover, bring to boil and simmer gently for 15 minutes or until carrots are tender. After 10 minutes add chickpeas.

Meanwhile, heat oil in small pan. Add onions and saute on medium or five to 10 minutes, stirred occasionally. Add ginger, garlic, cumin and ground pepper. Saute on medium-low for five minutes to allow flavours to blend.

Puree carrots, chickpeas and onion mixture together. Transfer back to pot and stir in lemon juice. Simmer gently 10 minutes more and adjust seasonings to taste.

MOM'S SOUP (HANKA'S SOUP)

This easy to prepare, heartwarming soup has been a staple in Neil's family for generations. It always happened to be simmering at just the right time. Neil's mother Hanka, made it with kliskalach (flat, square shaped noodles). If you can't find them, substitute rice-shaped orzo pasta.

1 tbsp. olive oil
1 large onion, chopped
4 medium potatoes, peeled, cut in eighths
3 sprigs Italian parsley, chopped
1 carrot chopped
1 stalk celery, chopped
¼ to ½ tsp. each salt and pepper, or to taste
4 cups vegetable stock
4 cups water
⅔ cup kliskalach or orzo noodles

Heat oil in fry pan and saute onions in olive oil until soft, translucent and golden. The longer you cook them, the more colour and flavour they add to the soup.

In a large pot, place stock, water, potatoes, parsley, celery and carrot. Bring to a boil and simmer 25 minutes. Add noodles, browned onions and salt and pepper to taste and simmer until noodles and potatoes are tender. Serves 8.

Israel given mixed grade on environmental protection

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Manfred Gerstenfeld is the apostle of a new, emerging field – Jewish environmental studies.

"It's still in its infancy, but it's growing," he said.

Manfred Gerstenfeld

Gerstenfeld, an environmentalist, chemist, economist, business consultant and author who lives in Jerusalem, said that Jewish tradition is rich in references to environmental concerns.

As he put it: "The Bible, Talmud, Midrash literature, rabbinical responsa and many other classical Jewish sources contain tens of thousands of scattered allusions to the subject."

Gerstenfeld, here on a private visit, said these sources refer to principles the modern environmental movement has adopted, from the prohibition against pollution to the concern for natural resources.

He cited several important reasons why the development of Jewish environmental studies as a separate field is desirable.

"Judaism has a unique approach to many of the key issues which preoccupy both environmentalists and environmental scholars.

"These include the sustainability of life on earth, the relationship of human beings in general and Jews in particular to nature, and the prevention of pollution."

Behind all these concepts, he said, is the idea that "the land is the lord's domain."

Gerstenfeld, the co-associate editor of the soon-to-be-published Encyclopedia of Religion and Nature, believes that the systematic study of the environment will yield insights about Jewish tradition.

"If such study advances further, its findings may gradually begin to influence Jewish attitudes toward the environment. At a later stage, it could have some impact on public environmental policy in Israel."

Israel has a mixed record, said Gerstenfeld, an Orthodox Jew born in Austria who immigrated to Israel from France in 1968.

"It's really strange," he said in an interview. "In certain areas, Israel is at the kindergarten level, while in other places, it's at the university level."

Israel is a world leader in the efficient utilization of scarce water resources, in the use of solar energy and in the battle against desertification.

On the other hand, there is very little basic awareness of the environment in Israel, and the Israeli government is not doing enough to combat environmental degradation.

"Israel has a dramatic existential problem," he explained, referring to Arab hostility. "So other issues receive greater priority. If you have nothing else to worry about, the environment becomes a major issue."

In the groves of academia, Gerstenfeld is a pioneer.

A member of an Israeli think tank called the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs, he has written two books about his pet topic: Judaism, Environmentalism and the Environment and The Jewish Environmental Tradition.

In 1997, he was the only speaker at the World Congress of Jewish Studies to present a paper on environmental issues from a Jewish point of view.

Jewish environmental studies has not attracted universal attention because it is an extremely fragmented field, he observed.

"Furthermore, its common terminology is not generally understood by those outside the field. Few people with a reasonable knowledge of Judaism have a broad understanding of environmental studies, or vice versa. These two worlds hardly meet."

Nevertheless, he pointed out, there are signs that change is afoot.

The Jerusalem College of Technology has established the Centre for Judaism and the Environment.

Touro College now offers a course on Judaism and the environment.

Further afield, Brandeis University and Vanderbilt University are considering the possibility of introducing courses about the environment and Jewish tradition.

Gerstenfeld is also thinking of starting a program on Judaism and the environment at the Jerusalem Centre for Public Affairs.

Program unites teens from diverse backgrounds

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The three Canadian high school students who participated in this summer's Bronfman Youth Fellowships in Israel are putting into practice the lessons of Jewish unity they learned on the program.

In fact, Sarah Brodbar-Nemzer, Naomi Hart and Noam Lockshin have been involved since last year in the Diverse Jewish Teen Discussion Group, a non-denominational study program begun by Hart's sister Rebecca, also a Bronfman alumna.

Now that Rebecca is in university, the three students, and a fourth, are running the program, which meets weekly at the Lipa Green building to study religious texts with a variety of teachers.

As part of the Bronfman program, the trio, along with 23 American counterparts (and for part of the trip, a group of Israeli students), spent five weeks in study, travel and dialogue with educators and political and literary figures representing a broad spectrum of views. There were some Arab representatives from a peace group, one of the students noted.

Brodbar-Nemzer, an OAC student in the Claude Watson program for the arts at Earl Haig Secondary School, had little formal Jewish education growing up but lived in Israel as a young child and has attended services regularly at Toronto's Kehillat Ahavat Hesed, a small egalitarian congregation.

In a way, she thought of the Bronfman program as an unattainable dream, because she knew people who hadn't been accepted. She was one of 213 applicants, chosen on the basis of character, intellectual interests, special talents and leadership qualities.

The program was launched 15 years ago by Edgar Bronfman, currently president of the World Jewish Congress, to develop future community leaders committed to the concept of Jewish unity.

Each of the participants struggled with the concept of what it means to be Jewish, said Brodbar-Nemzer.

The willingness to learn from each other and the ability to have a meaningful discussion was more important than feeling comfortable, she said, referring to the diverse Jewish backgrounds of the participants.

Although Brodbar-Nemzer has had many Shabbat dinners at Orthodox homes, some of the other students were meeting Jews from a segment of the community with which they would otherwise never have had contact, she said.

Lockshin, an OAC student at Yeshiva Or Chaim, said he thought the program would provide an opportunity to meet kids he wouldn't normally interact with, "which was true.

"Basically, with the exception of our discussion group, I live in a pretty homogeneous community, and I figured it would be interesting to meet people from different backgrounds and hear what they have to say."

Sharing space with non-Orthodox roommates and working out issues like the use of electricity on Shabbat was one example.

"I didn't really mind what they did, as long as I wasn't around and they weren't turning on lights for me," said Lockshin. "People were considerate enough that they didn't need to have such fixed rules."

Lockshin has given much thought to the rarity of such interdenominational programs. "There are good reasons that sometimes my community feels it wants to stick to itself," he said.

"When you try to build a community, you associate yourself with people who have the same observances and values, so you make schools together with them and you meet families who have the same ideologies."

But the interdenominational aspect of Bronfman worked well, he said. He's not sure, however, if such a project would work on a larger scale. "I think people might be less open. I'm trying to work on it in the real world with my discussion group."

Among the issues that arose, egalitarianism and the role of women were "huge," said Lockshin.

"I was very challenged by many things. There were things I'd never been forced to think about before." Ultimately the challenge reinforced his beliefs, he said.

Although he sees the Orthodox community as his "immediate community," he also feels part of the larger Jewish community and understands himself better than before embarking on the program, he said.

Hart, a Grade 12 drama major at the Etobicoke School of the Arts, said the Bronfman participants were "really open to each other."

As an unaffiliated Jew, she said she was "kind of an odd one out" but that all participants intermingled.

An alumna of Hebrew school and Jewish studies at the Bloor JCC, Hart is a member of the Narayever Congregation, a traditional egalitarian synagogue. She was drawn to the program by the opportunity to take part in intensive learning and to travel to Israel for the first time.

Hart described her Bronfman peers as "amazing, unique individuals, intelligent-minded and forward-thinking, and enjoyable to be around."

She found the lack of pressure to observe Judaism in a particular way "refreshing. I think people wanted to be themselves."

Beth Tikvah Congregation welcomes new cantor

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — After three years serving a congregation in Reno, Nev., it's a safe bet Cantor Avraham Keller didn't move to Toronto for the weather.

Although the new chazzan at Beth Tikvah Congregation rhapsodizes about the southwest lifestyle, picturesque sunsets and fresh air, the city's lack of a Jewish day school was a major catalyst in his and his wife Tamar's decision to move north after a year's sabbatical in Los Angeles.

The father of a 7-year-old boy and 4-year-old girl was also drawn by Beth Tikvah's "strong tradition of cantorial art and music," he said. "That's what I was looking for."

In Reno, Keller served as rabbi at Temple Emanu-el, an egalitarian Conservative congregation and his only pulpit in the United States. Keller has smichah from Kolel Ha'Idra, an Orthodox institution in Israel founded by Rabbi Shlomo Goren, who was at one time the country's chief rabbi. Keller is also a veteran of the IDF and a former army chaplain.

Serving a Conservative congregation was not really a culture shock, said Keller, 35, in an interview at Beth Tikvah, where he replaced Cantor Efraim Sapir at the end of the summer. (Sapir left to take a position in Florida.)

Keller, a native of Jerusalem, moved to New York, his mother's home town, at age eight, and soon had a taste of Conservative Judaism as a choir soloist. More recently, he served two Conservative congregations as cantor before taking the position in Reno. He is a member of the Cantors Assembly of America, the Conservative umbrella for chazzanim.

As a rabbi, Keller "brought in music as spiritual enhancement, but it was always through the back door. I always wanted to be able to do it as my main focus."

The lyric tenor said his music incorporates classical, chassidic, Sephardi, contemporary and traditional cantorial elements. He intimated that he might even get congregants "moved to the point of dance," but so far they've just been clapping along.

Cantor Avraham Keller

"I would say that prayer is a spiritual experience that does not leave the body aside...The process of body participation, rising and being seated – there's a reason for it," Chassidim, he noted, having been incorporating clapping and dance for many years.

The cantorate is a 'vital organism'

Like many of his colleagues, Keller is concerned about the future of the cantorate, but he still believes there is "a very good chance that we will have a thriving profession in the future."

In Keller's experience, cantors who are a generation older than he is are "pretty pessimistic about the cantorial art form.

"We are finding many congregations without cantors. We are finding congregations which had cantors but no longer desire to have a cantor. That's a concern, and I believe that may be a result of the cantorate not evolving quickly enough to the changing needs of the community."

Even so, he feels the cantorate is a "vital organism within the congregation...I think that there are more and more congregations which are re-evaluating, and I see the cantorate, as well, re-evaluating their evolution and adapting abilities."

Keller, whose father is a rabbi and whose grandfather was chief rabbi of Naharia, discussed his own adaptation to a Conservative congregation after training as an Orthodox rabbi. Before making the move, he consulted with a more experienced colleague, who expressed concern that the transition could cause Keller grief, both personal and professional.

"Within narrow-minded circles, obviously there is a lack of understanding and a discomfort level," he said. "With people who are broader minded, I find respect, and that includes rabbis in the Orthodox movement."

Although Keller never saw himself moving back east, an informal discussion with Toronto colleagues at a cantorial convention prompted him to consider the possibility; meeting congregants face-to-face during a weekend visit to Beth Tikvah was the deciding factor.

Lubavitcher Rebbe mural dedicated

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even the excitement of dedicating a mural to the memory of Rabbi Menachem Mendel Schneerson, the last Lubavitcher Rebbe, could not banish the shadows cast by the terrorist attack on the United States.

Guests at the event at Vaughan synagogue Chabad@Flamingo were restricted to entering through only one lane of traffic, passing by a K-9 unit, and having purses and packs checked at the door.

Nevertheless, the mood was relatively upbeat. Spiritual leader Rabbi Mendel Kaplan told the audience that while "everyone is shocked, frightened and insecure, and sports fields and theatres are closed," he had decided that the event, which included a cocktail reception, should go on, because it was a "simchah shel mitzvah – the mitzvah of glorifying and beautifying the house of God."

The mural, which sits on the landing between the classroom and sanctuary levels, is centred by a giant painting of the Rebbe's head. There are several other representations of him studying and praying, as well as pictures of the children of Rabbi Kaplan and of Susan and Robert Robinson, the artwork's benefactors.

Rabbi Kaplan refuted the widespread notion that it is wrong in Judaism to have paintings in a synagogue, a notion which he said is incorrect. In the sanctuary, there should be no distractions from focusing on God – much like the mechitzah, which prevents distractions from the opposite sex. However, art is acceptable elsewhere in the building; in Chassidut, it is seen as a "unique expression of the individual soul."

The artists are Gary Smith (who is not Jewish) and Sherry Rodney Kushner, a founding member of Chabad@Flamingo, as well as a member of the board of directors and president of the sisterhood.

The project was two years in the making. Smith looked at every video of the Rebbe he could find, as well as learning about Lubavitch ideology and way of life. He said that he was "struck by the Rebbe's vision. Everyone said that they were hypnotized by his eyes, so I made that the focal point of the mural."

He chose the collage technique because of the technical problems of the mural being on a landing, "so the horizon is only visible from one level."

Rodney Kushner said that she saw the Rebbe as a lamplighter, lighting the way to a better insight into the spiritual world. It is this characteristic of him that she tried to bring out in her work.

The Robinsons dedicated the mural to their children and their parents.

Rabbi Zalman Aaron Grossbaum led the audience in the recitation of psalms.

SPORTSFEST 2001: More than 60 participants recently paid $125 each to compete in five, 45-minute games of football, beach volleyball, basketball and baseball to raise money for the Rotman Research Institute, one of the world's leading research institutions specializing in senile dementia (housed in and affiliated with Baycrest Centre for Geriatric Care). Called Sportsfest 2001, the goal of this second annual volunteer-based, not-for-profit event was to raise $20,000 for the purchase of new leading edge equipment relating to work being done in Alzheimer's research.

Lockshin aims to boost Jewish Teacher Education program

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Martin Lockshin, the newly appointed director of York University's Centre for Jewish Studies, plans to strengthen its Jewish Teacher Education program.

Lockshin, who was appointed on July 1 for a renewable three-year term, wants to restructure the program so as to train more high-school teachers for Jewish schools.

"There is a very great need at that level," he said. "To that end, we will probably have to expand our advanced courses."

The centre trains more teachers for Jewish schools than any other university-based program in the Diaspora, he noted.

"Our graduates teach in almost every Jewish school in Toronto affiliated with the Board of Jewish Education: Orthodox, Conservative, Reform, unaffiliated, community and alternative.

"When the program was first established, many people thought we would not succeed in training teachers for such a wide variety of schools. We succeeded, perhaps beyond our own expectations."

As well, Lockshin hopes to bolster the centre's profile in Sephardic and Hebrew language studies, explore options for teaching Yiddish and fill the new Silber Family Chair for the Study of the Holocaust and Eastern European Jewry.

"While we have offered many courses in the past about the Holocaust, hiring a scholar who's an expert in Jewish life in Eastern Europe before the Holocaust would be a great addition to our course offerings."

Lockshin said the centre has become a fixture in Canadian academia by virtue of the fact that York has the biggest Jewish student enrolment in Canada.

"On average, we have about 1,000 course registrants in Jewish studies courses every year."

Many of the centre's professors play an integral role in Jewish communal life, from community governance to adult education.

"Our centre has faculty members who are Reform Jews, Conservative Jews and Orthodox Jews. We've taken a small but significant step towards alleviating the problem of divisiveness and factionalism in the Canadian Jewish community."

York, in 1968, became the first Canadian university to offer an array of courses in modern Hebrew.

During the 1970s and 1980s, York expanded its Jewish studies courses.

Under the leadership of Sydney Eisen, the centre itself was founded in 1989.

"Canada has nothing to be ashamed of in university Jewish studies. At the last World Congress for Jewish studies, in Jerusalem in August, there were 20 speakers from Canada on the program.

"As far as I could tell, there were larger numbers of speakers from only two countries, Israel and the United States."

York was represented by six speakers, including Lockshin.

"I think credit must be given to Canada's Jewish community for having had the foresight to realize that Jewish studies at the university level is crucial.

"Tens of thousands of young Jews spend exciting and impressionable years of their lives in Canadian universities, exploring new ideas and being encouraged by many instructors to rethink their values.

"It is crucial for the Jewish community that universities have a vibrant intellectual Jewish presence. Generous and forward-thinking community philanthropists have helped York and other Canadian universities establish such a presence. We hope they will help us grow."

Martin Lockshin

Lockshin believes that ethnic studies contributed to the popularity of Jewish studies at universities.

The trend today is towards more interdisciplinary kinds of Judaica courses that combine, for example, historical and literary studies.

"We're also seeing growth in Jewish studies courses that use new, cutting-edge methodologies, such as gender analysis, to analyze old texts and ideas."

Canadian Jewish studies departments suffer from one great weakness: a lack of solid programs in Hebrew language and in classical Jewish texts.

"It is unfortunate when students do not have the opportunity to acquire such basic skills at a university. I consider it regrettable that students can major in Jewish studies by taking a smattering of disparate high-level courses about ideas and movements without studying any Hebrew, Bible or classical rabbinic texts."

Lockshin, who turned 50 in April, was born in Toronto.

His parents, Sylvia and Louis, were key role models. "They taught me and my sisters, Brenda Freedman and Sherryn Lang, the importance of community involvement."

Lockshin studied at the Associated Hebrew Day School and the Community Hebrew Academy of Toronto.

"When I graduated from high school in 1969, there were hardly any universities teaching Jewish studies. So that career path did not cross my mind."

He earned a rabbinic ordination from Yeshivat Harav Kook in 1974, but was not really interested in being a rabbi. What appealed to him was a career as a university teacher in Judaica.

"I went to the excellent graduate school in Judaica at Brandeis University, and I was fortunate enough to be offered a job in my home town."

As a scholar, Lockshin examines the ways in which Jews have interpreted the Bible. "Much of my research and writing has been about Rabbi Samuel ben Meir, who lived in northern France in the 12th century."

Known as Rashbam, he wrote daring and heterodox interpretations of biblical verses. "I have been trying to understand and write about a scholar whose behaviour was most orthodox and whose thinking was unorthodox."

Since 1989, he has published two books on the subject – Rabbi Samuel ben Meir's Commentary on Genesis: An Annotated Translation and Rashbam's Commentary on Exodus: An Annotated Translation.

Later this year, Rashbam on Leviticus and Numbers: An Annotated Translation will appear. Currently, he is working on a fourth volume.

Lockshin's wife, Ruth, a Brandeis major in Jewish studies, is a technical writer. They have four children: Channa, Shoshanna, Noam and Reva.

"Channa, our oldest child and a graduate in Jewish studies at York, is now studying for a doctorate in Talmud at Columbia University."

All his children, he said, have strong Jewish values and Jewish intellectual interests.

Two Montrealers among the WTC's missing

By DAVID LAZARUS
Staff Reporter

MONTREAL — At writing, one Jewish Montrealer, described by his best friends as someone who would have done all he could to save others in the midst of the disaster, is still, along with his wife, officially listed among those missing in the devastation at the World Trade Center.

The family of Peter Feidelberg confirmed to The CJN that Feidelberg, 34, originally of Cote St. Luc, and his wife, Meredith Ewart, of Otterburn Park on the South Shore, both of whom worked on separate floors near the top of Two World Trade Center, had not been heard from since the terrorist attack Sept. 11.

Peter Feidelberg, Meredith Ewart

Feidelberg's stepmother, Dalia, feared the worst.

"It's terrible. It's terrible for us all," she said, her voice breaking.

"We tried to reach them Tuesday morning [Sept. 11] when we saw what happened.

"I tried to call their cell phone, but there was no circuit."

Feidelberg's father, Michael, 72, preferred not to speak to the media.

"We are private people," he said. "We tried to locate them but there's nothing."

Feidelberg's natural mother, Karen, died about 15 years ago.

One of Feidelberg's best friends, Richard Kirsch, 34, was ill at home when he saw on television the horror taking place in New York.

"I knew right away [that they might be victims]," he said in an interview.

Kirsch knew Feidelberg from the time they both attended Jewish Peoples Schools and Peretz Schools together over 20 years ago. They also both went to Bialik High School and travelled, together on a Bialik trip to Israel.

Kirsch and his wife, Caryn Roll, last saw Feidelberg and his wife at a belated wedding reception for the couple in August in Montreal. (They had been married in March 2000.) Feidelberg had been an usher at Kirsch and Roll's wedding.

The couple remembered Feidelberg as adventurous and as the "strong, silent type," Roll said.

He was a "kind, gentle man," she said. "He was funny, a very optimistic person... a really good friend."

Kirsch said Feidelberg was the kind of man "who would definitely have tried to help other people" after the disaster.

"It's hard to believe," he said. "The whole thing is just so hard to believe.

"I got a call from his first girlfriend, wanting to know if it was true. She was quite upset to say the least."

Roll remembered something Ewart had said to her husband at their wedding reception.

"She said something like: 'I hope that your wife will make you as happy as my husband has made me.'"

Rolls said she felt "quite numb," continuing to hold onto a glimmer of hope that perhaps Feidelberg was still alive.

Feidelberg and his wife both worked for the Fortune 500 company AON Corp., an insurance brokerage and consulting company with 1,350 employees.

They were among 200 employees (of 1,100 who had reported to work) who were not accounted for after a passenger jet, hijacked and piloted by terrorists, plowed into the second tower, causing it to collapse. The other Center tower was brought down by another passenger jet piloted by terrorists.

One of the main things Kirsch remembered about Feidelberg was how "very adventurous," competitive and athletically oriented he was.

Peter Feidelberg and Meredith Ewart at their wedding reception in Montreal in August.

Feidelberg was a participant in the 1998 New York City Marathon, enjoyed playing rugby and basketball, mountain biking, scuba diving and skiing, and had backpacked through Europe, Turkey, Costa Rica and other countries.

He met his wife in Montreal, and they settled in Hoboken, N.J., after both became employees at AON Corp.

AON's offices were located on floors 92 and 98 through 105 of Two World Trade Center.

After the disaster, AON chair and CEO Patrick Ryan issued a statement saying, "Our thoughts and prayers are with the people and their families who were affected by Tuesday's disaster.

"I know I speak for everyone in our AON family when I say that we share the concern, sadness and grief of the families of everyone involved in this horrendous tragedy.

"We will continue to do everything we can to locate our missing employees and to help their families."

Hoenlein's words prove prophetic

'Don't think the front line is far away'

By JULIA KOLLEK
Special to The CJN

HAMILTON — "Don't think the front line is far away," Jewish community leader and speaker Malcolm Hoenlein said about terrorism in a lecture called Israel at War: Challenge to North American Jewry, the evening before the terrorist attacks in New York and Washington.

Hoenlein, whose most recent tour took him from Montreal to Paris, Vienna, Kosovo, Frankfurt and Berlin, drew a crowd of nearly 500 people at the Adas Israel Synagogue.

"Canada lets in many terrorists," he said. "With Israel suffering now, each of us has to decide how are we going to respond? What are we going to tell our grandchildren when they ask us: 'What did you do when Israel was in trouble?'"

"There have been 7,000 incidents in Israel in the past year, and the world sets not just double, but impossible standards for Israel, like the recent charge of war crimes," Hoenlein said.

Meanwhile, he said, "Arafat does not want the responsibility of being head of state.

"After the Camp David agreement, he visited 32 countries. Saudi Arabia made $100 billion dollars in oil sales that year, and gave the Palestinians just $5 million. Arafat realized that nothing attracted support like the blood of young Palestinians. His popularity rating had plunged and unemployment was high. Now, his support has gone from 12 to 60 percent, and he has united his people," Hoenlein said.

"Our chagim are not just rituals, but about Jewish history – on every holiday we commemorate what happened to our people, and Arafat understands this.

"He understands that if you deny Jews the past, you deny them their future. This is why, for example, [Joseph's] tomb was destroyed. It is part of a systematic plan to destroy and eradicate our presence from the past.

"It is a war against Jewish history."

Hoenlein used a key incident as an example. "When we opened the door to a tunnel in Jerusalem, the world objected. There was no outcry over those killed in Sudan, in Afghanistan. The threat of this tunnel, built 2,000 years ago by Judah Maccabee, is the 'Judaizing' of Jerusalem.

Malcolm Hoenlein, centre, with Tom and Sasha Weisz, who, after hearing him speak in the United States, invited him to talk in Hamilton.

"Any person that goes through that tunnel, comes out and says 'I get it,' because there you see 2,000 years of Jewish history: you live it, you walk through it.

"Why do they want to take Jerusalem away? Did Mohammed ever visit there in his lifetime? Jerusalem is mentioned 700 times in our Bible – and it's mentioned not once in the Koran. Mohammed only ascended to heaven through Jerusalem on his horse."

Hoenlein urged his audience to write letters to politicians in support of Israel, to campaign against bias in the media and to visit the Jewish State.

"I was in Jerusalem 36 hours ago," he said. "The streets are empty. Thirty-one hotels have closed this year.

"The UJA and Israel Bonds have organized this evening together, and it is only when we stand together that we can overcome. We have in the past, and we will now."

Hoenlein is the executive vice-chair of the Conference of Presidents of Major Jewish Organizations, a co-ordinating body of over 50 international Jewish groups. He has written and lectured widely on a variety of topics relating to Jews in the Middle East and around the world.

Winnipeg CJA campaign draws larger number of volunteers

By MYRON LOVE
Prairies Correspondent

WINNIPEG — Gerry Koffman is sure that recent events in Israel and Durban, South Africa, influenced more people to volunteer at this year's Jewish Federation of Winnipeg/Combined Jewish Appeal's annual campaign.

"I have been the executive director of the CJA since 1994 and I have never seen such a large contingent of volunteers," he said.

"People were walking in off the street to volunteer. We had over 200 volunteers for Super Sunday."

The campaign began with Super Sunday on Sept. 9, and went on to include Super Week.

This year, the campaign organizers did something a little different. They sent letters and brochures outlining what the CJA does, in advance, to everyone on the phone list .

"We are proud of what we do," Koffman said. "We want to instill that pride in the community."

Based on the Super Sunday results, the campaign is off to a good start. Koffman reported that community members contacted on Super Sunday pledged just under $100,000 in total.

"We had gifts from over 1,400 households, including 83 first-time contributors and 48 people who skipped last year. Card for card we are up 14 percent at this stage."

The campaign has set a goal this year of under $4 million, up from over $3.5 million last year. (Last year's campaign finished $12,000 above target.)

As part of Super Sunday, the Federation/CJA held a family fun day at the Asper Jewish Community Campus with a petting zoo, face painting, clowns, arts and crafts, music and a variety of other activities.

Koffman said this year they plan a mini-Super Sunday in mid-campaign, on October 14, to try and contact people that canvassers have been unable to reach by that point.

Head of Canadian Blood Services urges community to give 'gift of life'

By DIANE KOVEN
Ottawa Correspondent

OTTAWA — Recently appointed chief executive officer of the Canadian Blood Services, Dr. Graham Sher, aims to increase blood donations and is looking to the Jewish community to think seriously about giving "the gift of life."

Sher, a native of Johannesburg, South Africa, has been in Canada since 1990 when he accepted a position at the University of Toronto to further his research on the physiology of pain. The following year, he entered the hematology program.

Both a medical doctor and a PhD, Sher was offered a faculty and staff position at U of T and the Toronto Hospital and took over the management of the blood transfusion services for both Toronto Hospital and Princess Margaret Hospital.

"That is where my interest in the blood system began," he says, "right during the time of the Krever Commission of Inquiry on the Blood System in Canada."

At the same time, he took a position in the Toronto Blood Centre and became the medical director for the Toronto centre of the Red Cross. When the Canadian Blood Services succeeded the Red Cross in 1998, he was recruited and moved to Ottawa.

Until the summer of 2001, he held the position of vice-president, medical and scientific affairs. His appointment as CEO is both exciting and challenging, he says.

"For me, it is a fascinating time to be where I am," he says. "It is a fascinating organization to work for. We are one of the leading blood systems in the world because of everything we went through.

"We have, at the same time, many challenges in this country, not the least of which is getting more donors through the door."

Sher hopes to make it easy and convenient for people to become blood donors, by making clinics more accessible. There are plans to hold clinics on weekends and in the evening; a pilot project in Ottawa will introduce the very first Bloodmobile, a fully equipped mobile clinic.

Sher wants people to realize the importance of donating blood.

"This is an entirely gratuitous donation," he says, "but the donation that they are giving can save lives. If people don't give enough blood, we always run the risk of not having enough for the patients that require it."

Sher and his wife, Erica, along with their three young sons who attend Hillel Academy, have become very involved in the Jewish community since moving to Ottawa and are pleased with the warm welcome they have received.

"The Jewish community is an important part of our lives here in Ottawa," he says.

Though his job is extremely time consuming, Sher strives to find time for family and community life as well.

"I am passionate about what I do," he says. "My job is very important to me. One of the struggles is to find enough time for my family – one always has to balance the two."

Ontario communities show solidarity with Israel

By ANNA MORGAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — The communities of Kitchener-Waterloo, Guelph and Cambridge came together last Sunday night to show their solidarity for the State of Israel.

More than 200 people gathered to launch their Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario UJA campaign and spend an evening in celebration of Jewish youth and community with Bais Groove, a rock band that played a combination of English, Yiddish and Hebrew songs.

Memorial candle lit by Marcia Wickett (left) and Manya Kay.

Events began with the lighting of a candle in memory of those who died in the recent terrorist attack in New York. After a minute of silence, Linda Budd, co-chair of the event, noted that it is unfortunate that it takes such a horrid event to make the world sit up and take notice.

Budd received a United Israel Appeal award from co-chair Stephen Kay and Michael Grand, vice-chair of Regional Jewish Communities of Ontario, Canadian Jewish Congress.

"For Jews, these events have been common – being glued to our TV sets as one more suicide bomber takes innocent lives [in Israel]," Budd said.

As Canadians, said Ed Morgan, chair of CJC, Ontario region, who was a speaker at the event, we have to be wary of the connections between the anti-Semitism that directs those who rush to criticize the prosecution of Nazi war criminals, the denigration of Holocaust education in the public schools, the severe anti-Zionist rhetoric found at the Durban conference and the slide into terrorist violence.

Referring specifically to the case of Kitchener's Helmut Oberlander, who was recently stripped of his citizenship by the federal cabinet for misrepresenting his wartime activities, Morgan said that "it's only in standing together as a community that this saga will end."

Investing in our youth, community and solidarity with Israel are crucial at this point in our history.

Recalling the pride he felt the first time he heard Hatikvah, Grand noted that times have changed.

"Shortly after Israel's formation, pride came naturally and quickly," Grand said. "Somehow we let that pride slip away."

The Order of the Day has changed

Scene in Ottawa

By G.K. SIMCOE

On the day Prime Minister Chrétien designated as a day of national mourning, the government House leader, Don Boudria, called a meeting of his colleagues from the other parties to co-ordinate the Parliamentary agenda. As could be expected, the ordre de jour changed substantially following the assault on America. Some of the issues that will be catapulted back onto the front burner are of particular interest to the Jewish community.

As the western world struggles to get a handle on terrorism, one of the first items that will be addressed is the issue of domestic terrorist links. Readers may recall that strangely enough, it was the libertarian Lloyd Axworthy and the similarly inclined Andy Scott at SolGen (Solicitor General) who first introduced legislation to isolate Canadian-based organizations that raise (charitable) funds for foreign groups suspected of terrorism.

The legislation got a rough ride – mostly out of concern that it gives the government undue latitude in monitoring the activities of even legitimate Canadian charities. There was also the suggestion that current legislation could satisfactorily address the issue – if the government only had the political will.

Well, the government now has it! And, we can expect swift attention to the matter.

A second area of concentration will be the whole question of enhanced security. This will touch on immigration matters, transportation and the like. Look for the Canadian Alliance to tap into the mood of simmering intolerance to argue for stiffer immigration criteria and a substantial reduction in refugee quotas. For the Alliance, it will be a way to make the news for reasons other than their leadership crisis and to re-connect with Canadians.

Finally, we can expect dramatic boosts to be directed to law enforcement at the national level (RCMP and CSIS) and a geometric leap in the priority status of the Defence Department. Art Eggleton may at last secure for Canada's armed forces the respect they deserve, where it counts most…the budget.

Oh, we forgot to mention one last thing – the so-called coalition to rid the world of the scourge of terrorism. Cynical as it may sound, we are betting that the sense of urgency currently being expressed won't last much longer than the patience of the frequent flyer who has to wait at an airport for three hours to take a 50 minute flight.

Violinist Isaac Stern, 81, dies in New York

Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

NEW YORK — Isaac Stern, the master violinist who saved Carnegie Hall from the wrecking ball, died Saturday at the age of 81.

Stern was one of the last great violinists of his generation and helped advance the careers of generations of musicians who followed, including Itzhak Perlman, Pinchas Zukerman and Yo-Yo Ma.

He died of heart failure at New York Weill Cornell Medical Center, said Ann Diebold, spokeswoman for Carnegie Hall. He had suffered from heart disease for several years and had been in and out of the hospital for the past six weeks, said Carnegie Hall Chair Sandy Weill.

Isaac Stern

Five-foot-six, rotund and with pudgy, dimpled hands, Stern commanded a rich tone and steady rhythm from his 18th century Guarneri violin. With his dynamic energy and fluid bow strokes, he was equally at home with the mathematical contortions of Bach and the fury of Beethoven as he was with the syncopations of Brahms and the convulsions of 20th-century composers. He was one of the most recorded classical musicians in history, making well over 100 recordings.

A supporter of Israel, tireless concertizer, teacher and raconteur, Stern played well over 175 performances by the late 1990s at Carnegie Hall, America's musical temple renowned for its acoustics. The hall was built by industrialist Andrew Carnegie and opened in 1891 with a concert conducted in part by Peter Ilich Tchaikovsky.

"Carnegie was, is and will not be only a building. It's an idea. It's a mythology, a necessary mythology about music," Stern said in a 1997 interview with CNN's Larry King.

In the late 1950s, as the city was planning Lincoln Center, a developer proposed razing Carnegie Hall and building a 44-story office tower with panels of bright red porcelain and diagonally placed windows. Life magazine in 1957 described the architect's plan as a strange-looking checkerboard. Using his prestige and his contacts among fellow artists and benefactors, Stern rallied the opposition, eventually securing legislation that enabled the city to acquire the building in 1960 for $5 million.

"I talked a lot," Stern told King. "It's something I do very well. When you believe in something, you can move mountains. I knew that this could not disappear from the face of the earth."

Stern was born in 1920 in Ukraine in the fledgling Soviet Union. His parents brought him to America when he was 10 months old, settling in San Francisco. Believing that music was an essential ingredient to education, they started him on the piano at age six. Two years later, after hearing a friend's violin playing, he picked up the fiddle and wound up playing it for the rest of his life. Ironically, he never went to college. He studied at the San Francisco Conservatory and with Naoum Blinder, concertmaster of the San Francisco Symphony and a violinist of the Russian school of playing.

At 16, Stern attracted his first national attention, performing the Brahms Violin Concerto with Pierre Monteux conducting the San Francisco Symphony in a concert broadcast on national radio. Seven years later, on Jan. 8, 1943, he made his Carnegie Hall debut in a recital produced by the impresario Sol Hurok. Performing with pianist Alexander Zakin, who became his longtime accompanist, Stern played Mozart, Bach, Szymanowski, Brahms and Wieniawski.

He later played in countless places around the world: Iceland, Greenland and the South Pacific for Allied troops during World War II; Moscow, after Stalin's death; Jerusalem's Mount Scopus, immediately after Israeli soldiers recaptured it in 1967; China, months after Washington restored full diplomatic relations in 1979. One country he refused to perform in was Germany, which he boycotted for years because of the Holocaust.

During the 1991 Gulf War, a siren warning of an Iraqi Scud missile attack interrupted a concert in Jerusalem. After the audience put on gas masks, Stern returned to the stage and played the Sarabande from Bach's D minor Partita for solo violin. He didn't wear a mask, saying he doubted Saddam Hussein would fire missiles at Jerusalem with its many Muslim holy sites and large Palestinian population.

"It was a very eerie sensation to look out in the hall with the audience covered with gas masks," he said.

Through the American-Israel Cultural Foundation, he helped finance the studies of many Israeli performers, including Perlman and Zukerman. He also helped arrange for Ma to study with the great cellist Leonard Rose – Stern's partner in the much recorded Istomin-Stern-Rose trio, along with the pianist Eugene Istomin, and he approached Hurok about the sensational young cellist.

At his peak, Stern would perform more than 200 concerts a year. He also played in the movies Humoresque, Fiddler on the Roof and on TV's Sesame Street. The Academy Award winning documentary From Mozart to Mao chronicled Stern's performance and tutoring in China in 1979 after the Cultural Revolution.

Stern ended his boycott of Germany in 1999 for a nine-day teaching seminar, saying it was time to see how young German musicians were absorbing their musical heritage of Bach, Beethoven, Brahms and Mendelssohn.

"It isn't very human not to give people a chance to change," he said at the time. "The time came when I wanted to hear, search and think. With my visit, I forgive nothing.

"I have a responsibility to pass on to the next generation what I learned from my teachers," Stern said. "It keeps me young and reminds me where I came from. Teaching young artists is like giving water to a flower."

Survivors include his wife, Linda Reynolds Stern, whom he married in 1996; three children from a previous marriage, daughter Shira, a rabbi, and sons Michael and David, both conductors; and five grandchildren.

Relatives of WTC victims confront halachic issues

By ALEXANDRA J. WALL
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

NEW YORK — Rabbi Avi Weiss has three families in his congregation waiting for New York Mayor Rudy Giuliani to decide whether their relatives are dead or alive.

"We're in a period of mourning between death and burial, which is in limbo," said Weiss, spiritual leader of the Hebrew Institute of Riverdale in the Bronx, N.Y.

The three linked to Weiss' congregation are among the thousands missing after the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks.

With more than 6,000 feared dead as a result of the attacks on the World Trade Center – an unknown number are Jewish – rabbis like Weiss are consulting experts in Halachah, or Jewish law, to find out how to mourn without a body.

And just as Halachah mandates what should be done from the moment of death to burial, it is explicit in what should be done in those cases when no body is found.

Rabbi Moshe Tendler, professor of talmudic law and medical ethics at Yeshivah University in New York, agrees that the question of when mourning can begin lies in Giuliani's hands.

"The moment he stops talking about the search-and-rescue mission, it means they're not looking anymore," said Tendler. "And as long as they're calling it a rescue mission, there's still hope in someone's heart."

Although the search was continuing early this week – albeit with little hope that any bodies might be found – Rabbi Jonathan Reiss, director of the Beth Din of America, said several families of the World Trade Center victims had already sought the Jewish court's help.

What makes this an especially difficult case, Reiss said, is that there is no way to determine with certainty that a particular victim was actually in the building at the time the planes hit.

"On the Titanic, you had a list of passengers," he said. "But in the case of the World Trade Center, it's harder to ascertain. Every single case has to be dealt with on an individual basis, with tremendous sensitivity and careful consideration."

Usually, Jews bury their dead within 24 hours.

In this case, Tendler said, Jewish law dictates that once the search is called off, shivah, or mourning, must commence as it would with any death, but without a funeral service.

"The service is a burial service and, in this case, there's nothing to bury," he said.

Tendler advised instead that a memorial service take place at the shloshim, the 30th day after death becomes official.

"Eulogies are for the living," he said, "and they should be done at a point where the family is already over the crying period and can control their emotions a little better."

Tendler said that in those instances when a body is recovered after the shivah period is completed, it is buried accompanied by a single day of mourning called yom likut atzamot, the day that the bones are buried.

There is nothing in Jewish law prohibiting having a tombstone for individuals who perished in the Sept. 11 attack, said Tendler.

But when asked, he advises a living memorial such as a playground with a memorial plaque as a more suitable way to remember the dead.

Rabbi Mark Washofsky said he had heard of cases where Jewish families held memorial services for those lost in the World Trade Center attack, despite the fact that the search hadn't been called off yet.

Washofsky said that these families of Reform Jews decided for themselves that they had no hopes of finding their loved ones alive.

"The families wanted to do something ritually marking the beginning of the mourning process, and shivah would have been cut short by Rosh Hashanah, so they felt the need to do something quickly," said Warshofsky, associate professor of rabbinics at Hebrew Union College-Jewish Institute of Religion in Cincinnati.

'As long as they're calling it a rescue mission, there's still hope in someone's heart'

Issues of Jewish law regarding divorce may also arise if men's bodies are not found.

More than one piece of evidence is needed to prove that he is dead, or else his widow is considered an agunah, or "chained woman," because he never issued her a get, a Jewish divorce document. Without such a document, a Jewish woman is not permitted to remarry according to Jewish law.

Tendler said that in the case of the World Trade Center, every effort will be made to ensure that the man had died in the explosion.

If it could be proven beyond a reasonable doubt that he was in the building, and that the marriage between he and his wife was a happy one, Tendler said that "a ruling would be given that surely he is dead, and she would be free to start picking up the pieces of her life."

Halachic issues aside, the lack of a body can make what is already an extremely difficult grieving process even more so, experts say.

Samuel Heilman, a Queens College sociology professor whose latest book is When a Jew Dies: The Ethnography of a Bereaved Son, made the point that the purifying washing ritual performed after death is as much for the soul as it is for the body.

"The purification and burial can't be done when there is an absence of a body," said Heilman, noting that those rituals serve as a kind of "seeing-off" of the body.

Without a physical place for the family to visit the body, he added, "There's no feeling of closure. It's as if the soul that resided in that body has not reached its destination and is in tortured limbo because the body hasn't been purified and laid to rest."

Chief of Staff Mofaz: Israel ready for attack

By DALIA SHEHORI
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Chief of Staff Shaul Mofaz told the Knesset Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee on Sunday that following the attacks on New York and Washington, the Israel Defence Forces had reviewed all possible terror attack options in Israel and examined whether there were cracks or weak links in the security system.

"We have mapped all the possibilities in the air, sea and land, and have examined and will continue to examine whether any loopholes exist," Mofaz said. "We are constantly examining ourselves and the way we handle situations."

After the meeting, Mofaz said that the security establishment was prepared for the possibility of an attack on Israel following future assaults by the United States. Mofaz referred to panic-instilling proclamations about the need to be equipped with gas masks, and said the public must be calmed down and not scared.

"The public can remain calm, all steps to prepare for any developments have been taken," he said.

During his speech to the Foreign Affairs and Defence Committee, Mofaz focused on Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat's intentions. Mofaz said the PA will make every effort to be included with the "good guys," with the anti-terror coalition, but "I must say that the PA's strategic targets have not changed. There is no change at the moment. Not in the strategic target, nor in the ways in which to achieve this target," he said.

Mofaz emphasized that the PA was now acting according to U.S. expectations and decreasing the amount of violence, but that the IDF had not seen intensive activity to stop terror operations.

Bin Laden's family found shelter in Syria

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

JERUSALEM — Osama bin Laden's closest relatives found sanctuary in Syria after the leader of the Al Qaeda terrorist network was forced to leave Sudan some years ago and headed to Afghanistan. According to reports, bin Laden's family left Syria before the Sept. 11 attack on the World Trade Center in New York and the Pentagon in Washington.

It's clear that he moved his family to Syria with the approval of the Syrian authorities, achieved, in all likelihood, by means of financial support that he made available to Damascus.

Syria has long served as a refuge for extremists wanted by international law and individuals involved in terrorism activities, including top Nazi officials after World War II. More recently, Damascus provided shelter to the head of the Kurdish Workers party, Abdullah Ocalan, who was wanted by the Turkish authorities for his role in terror attacks in that country. Syria moved Ocalan out of the country only after coming under intense pressure from Turkey to do so.

Others who still find refuge in Syria are leaders of Palestinian terror groups, such as Ahmed Jibril, as well as Islamic Jihad leaders, including the current leader of the movement, Abdullah Shalah.

According to one still unconfirmed report, bin Laden's family left Syria just before the attack on the Twin Towers and the Pentagon. It is not known if they went to Afghanistan, but the issue is expected to arise when the question of Syrian involvement in the U.S.-led coalition against international terrorism comes up. Damascus will have to explain to Washington its relationship with bin Laden and what Syrian intelligence knows about his and his family's activities while they were in Syria.

The Week in Israel

Sept. 17
• The United States invited Israel to participate in the international anti-terror coalition the White House is assembling.
• Israeli Arab legislators refused to support a Knesset resolution that denounced last week's Palestinian celebrations over the terror strikes in the U.S. They also refused to sign the Knesset's letter of sympathy with the American people.

Sept. 18
• Rosh Hashanah.
• Israel's population was reported to be 6.458 million, of whom 5.243 million are Jews and 1.215 are Arabs. Jews thus make up 81.3 percent of the country's population. The population rose by 147,000 in the last year, an increase of 2.3 percent, compared to 2.6 percent the previous year.

Sept. 19
• Rosh Hashanah.
• A ceasefire was proclaimed by Yasser Arafat; Israel ordered the pull-back of some of its heavy weaponry from Palestinian-controlled areas.

Sept. 20
• Despite the ceasefire, an Israeli woman, Sarit Amrani, a mother of three from the community of Nokdim, was killed in a drive-by shooting on the West Bank. Her husband was wounded. A ceasefire meeting scheduled between Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat was cancelled. It was tentatively rescheduled for Saturday night.

Sept. 21
• Yasser Arafat convened an urgent session of the leaders of all the Palestinian political factions to emphasize the utmost importance he attaches to keeping the ceasefire, and to make clear his determination to have it enforced. He decided on the session in consultations with the PLO executive council and the negotiating team with Israel.

Israel's degree of maneuverability

Comment

By ZE'EV SCHIFF
Ha'aretz Daily Newspaper Ltd.

It is commonly thought in Israel that the recent terror attacks in the United States have vastly increased the degree of Israel's maneuverability in its military conflict with the Palestinians and that the Israel Defence Forces can now allow itself to do what it could not do before. People who think this way are going overboard.

World public opinion includes awareness that the Palestinians have been responsible for ghastly terror attacks; however, at the same time, Israel is perceived in the eyes of world as an occupying power. Israel can use its limited increased maneuverability, not to reinforce its occupation of Palestinian lands, but rather to move against those who carry out terrorist attacks.

The Americans can say to Israel, just as they said during the Gulf War after Iraq's occupation of Kuwait, that they are not interested in opening a new front vis-a-vis the Palestinians or vis-a-vis Syria while they are busy trying to form a massive international coalition against Islamic terror. It is quite possible that a situation could develop in which Israel will not be invited to join this coalition, and it would certainly be no tragedy if Israel settles for some sort of pragmatic backroom coalition with Washington. However, it would be very ironic if Palestinian Authority Chairman Yasser Arafat is recruited into this international coalition against terror.

Syria will be invited to join the international coalition, just as it was invited to join a similar one on the eve of the Gulf War. However, if Syrian membership in the coalition is not made conditional upon its meeting certain unequivocal stipulations such as the imposition of a ceasefire on both Hamas and Islamic Jihad, the world will not be entering a new era in the war against terror, as has been trumpeted. In such an absurd situation, perhaps Osama bin Laden himself should be invited to join the coalition as a penitent who has renounced terrorism forever.

How can Israel operate in a manner that will be acceptable in the eyes of many of the members of the international community?

If Israel utilizes its degree of military maneuverability in a concentrated offensive against suicide-bomber terrorists, Israel's actions will be greeted with considerable understanding. The sudden change in direction that has taken place in world opinion will enable Israel to conduct an all-out, no-holds-barred war against those who send suicide bombers to attack innocent civilians, against those (such as spiritual leaders) who incite the suicide bombers to launch those attacks, and against those who do the same things (that is, inciting and dispatching suicide bombers) within Israel's Arab minority.

In this area, Israel must conduct an all-out war, but not just through military means. A democracy must know how to effectively protect itself.

A second area in which Israel can allow itself to operate with much greater determination is in the war on those who sponsor the leaders of suicide bomber terrorism.

Afghanistan, which sponsors bin Laden, is no different from Syria, which sponsors the leaders of Islamic Jihad, which has committed dozens of suicide bomber terrorist attacks. If the principle of punishing the sponsors of suicide-bomber terrorism does not apply to Syria, it does not apply to Afghanistan either.

If Syria can join a coalition committed to a war on terrorism, Afghanistan can also join. If, in addition, Syria is allowed to become a member of the UN Security Council, while the leader of Islamic Jihad and those of his ilk gladly soak up the sun in Damascus and continue to plan further terrorist attacks, the world is not entering a new era in the war on terrorism but is instead sinking deeper and deeper into the mud.

Media reaction to U.S. terror attacks

According to Reports

A flood of media items this past week relating to the terrorist attacks in the United States demands attention. To mention just a few:

• The National Post and the Globe and Mail have drawn attention in their editorials and columns to the disturbing amount of blatant anti-American sentiment expressed in some Canadian media and also heard widely on call-in programs, especially on the CBC, that essentially blames the victim for the horrific destruction in New York and Washington. Most often conjoined with this anti-Americanism are the predictable anti-Israel tirades which argue directly or indirectly that "pro-Israel" U.S. policy has brought retribution upon the Americans.

The Globe editorial of September 19 observed, "Anti-American sentiment is hardly new in Canada. There has always been a camp that considers the United States to be the root of all evil. But to see it emerge now, when Americans are still in the depths of their grief, is disturbing. Have these people no sense of decency?"

Apparently not. To take but one prominent example: The Toronto Star's Haroon Siddiqui, last month a recipient of the Order of Canada, devoted his column of the 19th to arguing that U.S. wrongdoing abroad – including, of course, its support of Israel – has basically motivated the terrorists to commit mass murder. By the time Siddiqui adds that "no grievance can ever justify what happened last week," the gratuitousness of the remark is all that remains.

Siddiqui's article indulges in oversimplification, distortion and the use of straw man argumentation – he charges "apologists for America" (who exactly?) with promoting a racist agenda against the Muslim world. Anyone who heard Siddiqui on the CBC Town Hall of the same night supporting the United States fight against terrorism – if properly conducted – could not possibly recognize him as the same person who penned the Star screed.

In a column written just a few months ago ("Media world coverage shallow, often biased," April 29), Siddiqui cautioned against "narratives that are too cruel to be credible in this sophisticated postmodern nation." Too bad he didn't listen to his own advice.

• The CBC's Neil Macdonald was one of a small number of journalists to report fully (September 13 and 15) – in contrast to the BBC – on the PA intimidation of journalists who took pictures of Palestinians rejoicing over the terrorist bombings in the United States. He confronted the AP bureau chief who has been withholding such film because of death threats from the PA to the AP cameraman, a Palestinian working in the West Bank.

Both Macdonald and CBC Radio correspondent Mike Hornbrook have recently led the charge to have the Israeli Foreign Press Association take a more aggressive stand against PA intimidation of journalists in the territories.

• The award for sheer idiocy, to say nothing of what appears to be barely disguised malice, goes to columnist Peter Duffy of the Halifax Sunday Herald (September 16) for suggesting that Israelis probably knew in advance about the terrorist plot against the United States but withheld the information from the Americans in order to gain from this unspeakable tragedy.

Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir tours North America

By CYNTHIA GASNER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — The internationally acclaimed Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir will be presenting concerts throughout North America this fall.

The choir will perform songs ranging from concert cantorial to Broadway showtunes and modern jazz, in eight languages, including Yiddish, Spanish, Russian and English.

The group of 10 tenors, led by performer/artistic director Michael Turetsky, will perform in Toronto on Saturday, Oct. 13 at the Toronto Centre for the Arts (formerly the Ford Centre), and on Sunday, Oct. 14 at Beth Tzedec Synagogue. From there they will travel to Montreal and perform on Tuesday, Oct. 16 before touring throughout the United States and ending at Carnegie Hall on Nov. 14.

The Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir was created in 1989 as part of a program to revive the art of cantor and choir music of the synagogue in Russia. With the support of the American JDC Joint and the senior rabbi of the former Soviet Union, Adolph Shaevich, the project was fully realized in 1990.

Turetsky later exp ,ded the choir's repertoire to include many additional types of music in order to introduce to Russian Jews a wide variety of musical experiences. He now brings this mix to international audiences.

The members of the choir have lived under Communist oppression and with threats of anti-Semitic violence. Despite this and their difficulty obtaining funding, they have brought back to Russia Jewish music which has not been performed there for more than 70 years.

A sign of the change in Russia came in 1999 when the choir was officially recognized by Mikhail Gorbachev and was the winner of the World Cantors Gold Crown Award.

The choir has performed with cantors Joseph Malovani, David Bagly and Benjamin Miller. They have also appeared with international virtuosos Placido Domingo and Zubin Mehta.

Producer Ella Tcheloznova, who is bringing the choir to Canada, says that when she first heard the choir's disc, "I was very excited and determined to bring them here."

Michael Turetsky leads the Moscow Jewish Chamber Choir.

Tcheloznova says that it took a lot of courage for Turetsky to form a Jewish group.

"There was still a lot of anti-Semitism then," she says. "Jewish traditional songs were not popular as Jewish culture was not. We were even afraid to go to a synagogue – today they can sing freely in Russia and they play to sold out performance everywhere."

For more information or for tickets, call The Centre for the Arts, 5040 Yonge St., 416-870-8000, or for the Beth Tzedec concert, call 416-491-3014. Tickets range from $30 to $75.

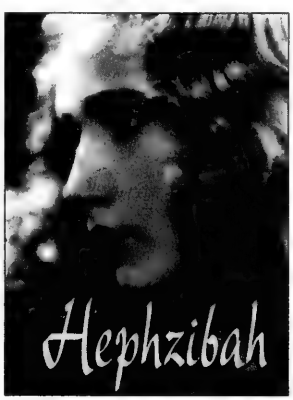
Sympathetic profile of Hephzibah Menuhin

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

Hephzibah Menuhin, the sister of renowned violinist Yehudi Menuhin, was a woman in her own right.

A child prodigy, like her brother, and a gifted pianist, she gave up a promising music career at the age of 18 to marry Lindsay Nicholas, a wealthy Australian sheep farmer.

Hephzibah, however, was more than a devoted wife, helpmate and mother. She contributed to a mobile library service and to the cause of children's education. She was also a charter member of Australia's feminist movement.



As she outgrew the constricting confines of her new life in western Australia, she and Lindsay, the love of her life, drew apart.

Eventually, she divorced Lindsay, leaving him to care for their two boys, Kron and Marston. She became a social activist as well as a concert pianist.

Curtis Levy's sympathetic profile, Hephzibah, will be premiered on Thursday, Sept. 27 at 10 p.m. on TVOntario. It will be repeated on Saturday, Sept. 29 at 3:35 a.m.

This appealing film is based on a mix of family interviews, home movie footage, personal letters and original recordings.

Among those who fondly remember Hephzibah are her siblings, Yehudi and Yalta. Her two sons are not so enamored.

Hephzibah met and married Lindsay in 1938, the same year Yehudi wed Lindsay's fetching red-haired sister, Nola.

Smitten by Lindsay, but also looking for a way to leave her overbearing Russian-Jewish mother, she proposed marriage.

The young, vivacious couple went to Australia, far from Hephzibah's home in California.

At first, Hephzibah was blissfully happy in her new surroundings. But as the years elapsed, she realized that she and Lindsay were not really suited for each other.

While she was outgoing and fizzy, he was quiet and withdrawn. He was content with farming, but her horizons stretched far wider. As she put it, they spoke "different languages." And in staid Australia, she became something of a rebel.

Levy suggests that some members of the conservative Nicholas clan were less than enthusiastic about having a Jew in the family.

After World War II, she visited Thersienstadt, the former concentration camp where Jews perished during the Holocaust. It strengthened her resolve to help people in need, specifically Jewish refugees newly arrived in Australia.

Hephzibah's life took a radical turn after she meet Richard Hauser, a Jewish sociologist from Vienna. He shared her ideas and notions. They had an affair, and subsequently, she left Lindsay (who never appears on screen in an interview).

Hauser and Hephzibah moved to London. There, in their home, they formed the Centre for Human Rights, a refuge for refugees, battered women and the homeless.

During this period, she resumed her career as a pianist, accompanying Yehudi in concerts. He claims that she was a great musician.

Hephzibah was felled by cancer in 1981. She was 60. A remarkable woman passed from the scene. Levy captures the essence of her personality in this affecting film.

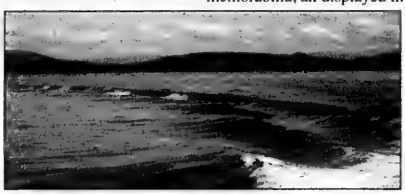
Whale watching on little-known Pacific islands

By BARBARA KINGSTONE
Special to The CJN

SAN JUAN ISLANDS — At the departure gate, the American immigration officer at the Canadian airport asked where and what the San Juan Islands are, and I felt like Columbus about to discover America. One hint – they aren't in the Caribbean.

These islands, about 172 in various sizes and shaped like a horseshoe, are located in the Pacific northwest, off the coast of and part of the State of Washington. To be exact, they're 48 kilometres north of Seattle, 87 kilometres south of Vancouver and 18 kilometres east of Victoria.

I had several reasons for visiting this far off, little known getaway: Orcas Island, the largest of the San Juans, is an area known for whale watching, a rain forest and 33 hiking trails, as well as the Rosario Resort and Spa, the turn-of-the-century Moran mansion with an interesting history.



Getting there was certainly half the fun, and during a 50-minute airflight on a six-seater seaplane, I was able to see spectacular mountains and islands and the Seattle skyline. We descended onto the water and bounced our way directly to the Rosario marina. Waiting on the dock were two impressively physically fit people who helped us with our luggage on the short walk to the main house. They told me that among the many reasons they love living here, is that Orcas offer so many activities.

Completed in 1909, the hotel was a private residence until 1960. It was renovated in 1997.

It sits on the shores of Cascade Bay, and from a quick observation before checking in, I saw a heavily treed hillside, the vistas of the harbour and, to my surprise, a deer roaming nonchalantly. Because there are no predatory animals here, it is quite common to see deer and even to have the opportunity to feed them, which I did the very first morning. They ultimately die of old age.

Within minutes, we were at the main house, Moran Mansion, built on 30 acres of waterfront property, which is listed in the National Register of Historic Places and a member of the National Trust Historic Hotels of American.

Robert Moran, a shipbuilder, a prominent businessman in Seattle and former mayor of that city, was told that unless he gave up his hectic pace of life in the big city, he would soon die. Orcas Island seemed to be a better option.

So he left Seattle with the intention of dedicating himself to remaining healthy and staying alive. He proceeded to design and build a 53-room home which resembles the great ocean liners of that period. As they say, you can take the shipbuilder away from building, but you can't take building out of a shipbuilder.

Even the furniture, which he designed in the living quarters of the mansion turned hotel-cum-museum, is shipwright-built dressers and desks. In 1908, this five-storey home, dug 16 feet into solid granite, cost US $2 million. Among the many treasures in the teak and mahogany mansion, is an Aeolian pipe organ, the largest ever to be installed in a private home in the United States, along with a rare Tiffany chandelier and other memorabilia, all displayed in the second floor museum.

Along the walls of the public areas, are black and white framed and enlarged photographs taken by Moran, a capable, amateur photographer, showing his family and friends, and indicating the lifestyle that existed at that time. I could only smile when I looked at them with their gloomy faces and all dressed up in their Sunday best. It was Moran who named the house Rosario – a safe place, a safe harbour.

Today, within this 127-room resort are several freestanding buildings that were added and are nestled in the hills among trees. My room was spacious and well decorated, but I most appreciated the balcony where I had an unobstructed view of Cascade Bay, could smell the cedars, the rhododendrons and the azaleas and see the wandering deer, and then retreat to the large Jacuzzi tub in the large bathroom. Because evenings are cool, I only had to switch on the gas fireplace to create enough heat for my comfort.

The big day arrived and I rushed down to the marina to join 20 other eager thrill seekers on the Squito, one of the 36-foot boats of Deer Harbor Charters, for a 5½-hour whale watching excursion. Soon into the voyage, I spotted two bald eagles, and a little later, we passed harbour seals sunning themselves on rocks (there are some 60,000 seals in the area). Finally more than two hours into the trip, I spotted the first of the 20 orcas (killer whales) I would see that day.

"They travel in pairs," James, a naturalist who was our guide, told us.

Then there were more. As we continued our whale watch, I became accustomed to looking very quickly and could see some of the white markings on their shiny black bodies. They are majestic creatures with six-foot-long fins – a rounded tip for males and curved for females. They stay together for life. Adult males live to about 50 years old while females live to 100. Orcas live in groups of five to 60 with a predictable route of 300 to 360 kilometres.

Since the regular dive pattern is three or four short dives in about 15 seconds, you have to focus quickly. This is followed by a disappearance of three to five minutes. The orcas have cone shaped snouts, single blowholes and can travel at an amazing speed of 30 miles per hour. James, at one point, without interfering with the whales, got us to within about 40 feet of some of them.

Back on terra firma after a very cold trip, most of us hugging hot coffee mugs to keep our hands warm, I didn't want to miss the spa experience offered at Rosario. Luck was still with me and I was able to book an appointment at the spa. With a plethora of choices, I opted for a deep massage rather than the Swedish or Aromatherapy treatment. Of course, there are skin care treatments, a well equipped and up to the minute gym, indoor and outdoor pools and yoga. But who had all that time?

There seemed to be something for everyone. This includes the 5,000-acre Moran State Park where, from the tower, I could see snow capped Mt. Baker and a range of Canadian mountains.

You can contact Rosario Resort & Spa by phone at 360-376-2222, or fax 360-376-2289. Guests are met on arrival at Orcas.

From Vancouver by car: Follow I-5 towards Seattle, exit State Route #20 (exit 230), and follow signs to San Juan Island Ferry.

A brief history of (Israeli) time

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

It's About Time is a clever, amusing Israeli documentary about the concept of time as seen through the eyes of Israelis.

Produced, directed and written by Elona Ariel and Ayelet Menahemi, it was screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival.

Described as a "mosaic of dialogues," it unfolds through a series of informative interviews with, among others, an Olympic swimmer, a psychiatrist, a news editor, an elderly couple, a rabbi, a lifeguard, a little girl, a standup comedian, a group of friends kibitzing and playing dominoes and a kibbutznik.

Their comments, sprinkled with humour and insights, range far and wide. As a result, our understanding of the nuances of Israel's diverse society is enhanced.

So what is Israeli time? The short answer is that it does not exist. The longer answer is far more interesting.

As the rabbi puts it, "Every moment is unique."

Virtually everyone agrees that Israel, which was born in a hurry, teeters between Middle Eastern and Western concepts of time.

Take Haya and Vital, the couple who have been married for decades. Haya, an Ashkenazi, feels pressured by the constraints of time. Vital, a Sephardi from Salonika, is her polar opposite. Their attitudes are a function of societal influences.

It is observed that Israel is the product of 2,000 years of Jewish persecution. "When you're chased you run fast," a man says.

For many Israelis, particularly younger ones still subject to military service, time is a precious commodity because of the possibility of sudden death or disfigurement.

"You don't know if you'll make it to the age of 24," observes Aviv, some of whose friends fell in the 1973 Yom Kippur War.

Mashka, a rough-hewn kibbutznik from the northern Negev, concurs. "We live by the years of war," she notes.

Ilan, a busy TV news editor, works to constant deadlines. The clock is always ticking.

What happens in Israel in a week, happens in a year in a somnolent country like Switzerland.

In this vein, Kinneret, a younger woman, points out that Israelis physically tire sooner because they experience so much more in their daily lives.

To escape the tension and the rat race, they go on vacation in the languid Far East.

Mickey, the swimmer, is most pressured by time. For him, a tenth of a second makes a difference.

Due to the Internet and the proliferation of convenient household gadgets, life in Israel is faster today for the so-called "microwave generation."

Concomitantly, the availability of movie cassettes has, to some extent, isolated people in their homes.

Haya believes that people had more time for each other in the early years of statehood, when Israel was like "one big community."

The sun-bleached life guard holds that Israel was more of a relaxed country when he was younger. And so he admires slow-moving turtles.

Time is of essence in Israel, judging by this Israeli nervously glancing at his watch.

Alma, a 10-year-old girl, complains that time passes too slowly. Wait till she grows up!

Israelis are habitually late because they try to cram too much into their lives, we're told. They feel offended when others think they have "time to kill."

Apart from the high holidays, Israelis slow down only on Holocaust Memorial Day, when they solemnly stop to remember and honour the six million victims.

Probing and quite original, It's About Time is a two-for-one film. It not only informs but entertains.

Can anyone ask for more?

In Israel, time defines a person

By SHELDON KIRSHNER
Staff Reporter

TORONTO – "Israelis can't relax and let time pass," said Ayelet Menahemi, the co-producer and director of It's About Time. "There is a sense of urgency in Israel.

"Defining Israeli time is like defining Israel itself," observed Elona Ariel, her partner. "It's multi-layered and complex."

Screened at the recent Toronto International Film Festival, It's About Time is supposedly the first Israeli film to deal exclusively with that elusive topic.

The recipient of the Best Documentary Award at last July's Jerusalem Film Festival, it explores a subject many take for granted but rarely explore at length.

"Israeli time varies a lot, given Israel's cultural complexity," said Menahemi, who was born in Tel Aviv in 1963.

"Israel is only 53 years old, and is changing so fast that everything is transitory."

"Time is very precious in Israel," said Ariel, a sabra who was born in 1958 and has lived in New York City and Asia.

"You can be dead the next moment."

As they readily admit, the idea for It's About Time was not theirs.

"It was chosen for us," explained Menahemi, who has also made TV commercials and music videos. "Channel 8 in Israel initiated the project."

Channel 8 planned to screen it last year, when the new millennium began, but could not because Menahemi and Ariel requested more time to flesh out the concept, write the script and gather interviews.

"Channel 8 suggested an academic approach," said Menahemi. "We preferred a personalized approach."

It's About Time, which will be aired on Channel 8 right after Yom Kippur, was their second joint movie for Karuna Films, which they established in 1995.

Their first, Doing Time, Doing Vipassana, was a prize-winning documentary on a type of Indian meditation practised in prisons.

They believe that time defines a person, especially in Israel.

Take the concept of punctuality, for example. Israelis most likely to be punctual are young, career-oriented professionals trying to be like Americans.

On the other hand, tradesmen and small shopkeepers are habitually late.

"Israelis are pissed off if someone else is late," said Ariel. "Then they turn around and do the same!"

In the end, they both agreed, their fellow Israelis are improvisers with a knack for adapting to new situations.

Menahemi, whose family settled in Israel long ago, has made two feature films, Skippers 3 (1991) and Tel Aviv Stories (1992).

Currently, she is working on a screenplay for a romantic comedy to be set in Israel and China.

Ariel, a former musician and photographer whose parents are Holocaust survivors, is thinking about making a documentary about a Burmese farmer.

STORIES THAT WARM THE HEART

In some small way, it is perhaps fortuitous timing that a new softcover edition of Chicken Soup for the Jewish Soul arrived in Canadian bookstores last week, mere days after the traumatic devastation of New York and Washington. Even a small candle, it is said, can chase the darkness from a room and replace it, however temporarily, with light.

This popular anthology of dozens of simple heart-warming tales includes one by Toronto Rabbi Roy Tannenbaum of Beth Tzedec Congregation and others by many well-known personalities such as Kirk Douglas, Anne Frank, Golda Meir, George Burns, Harold Kushner and former New York mayor Ed Koch.

Anne Frank's uplifting words of roughly 60 years ago were in reference to the evil-doers of that dark era but they seem to apply equally well to their modern counterparts.

"It's really a wonder that I haven't dropped all my ideals, because they seem so absurd and impossible to carry out," she wrote in her diary.

"Yet I keep them, because in spite of everything I still believe that people are really good at heart. I simply can't build up my hopes on a foundation consisting of confusion, misery and death. I see the world gradually being turned into a wilderness. I hear the ever-approaching thunder, which will destroy us, too. I can feel the sufferings of millions and yet, if I look up into the heavens, I think that it will all come right, that this cruelty too will end, and that peace and tranquility will return again.

"In the meantime, I must uphold my ideals, for perhaps the time will come when I shall be able to carry them out."

The Innocent Ear: The Toronto Symphony Orchestra has announced it will play unidentified pieces of music at many concerts in its upcoming season. The musical curios may be the work of famous or little-known composers and involve a solo instrument or the full 100-piece orchestra.

"We won't reveal the title or composer of the piece until after the entire run of performances, at which time you'll be able to log on to our website to find the answer," a TSO infocard explains.

Why the mystery? It's because too often we let the heavy freight of a name and all its associations interfere with what we are hearing. The plan, which is called The Innocent Ear, is designed to deliver "something unexpected that thrills and energizes" and that will "stimulate your imagination and provoke thought and discussion." 416-598-3375 or www.tso.on.ca.

Quotable Quotes

Here are a few chapter inscriptions from Chicken Soup for the Jewish Soul:

– "Hatred and bitterness can never cure the disease of fear; only love can do that. Hatred paralyzes life; love releases it. Hatred confuses life. Love harmonizes it. Hatred darkens life; love illuminates it." Martin Luther King, Jr.

– "The highest form of wisdom is kindness." Talmud.

– "Always come to the aid of those who are being oppressed." Rabbi Nahman of Bratslav.

– "No one ever becomes poor through the giving of charity." Maimonides.

– "Prejudice is the reason of fools." Voltaire.

And speaking of inscriptions, may we all be inscribed in the Book of Life for the coming year.

Hospital daycare program benefits cancer patients

By ERIN SILVER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Sharon Solomon was diagnosed with breast cancer in 1994. While undergoing treatment for the disease, her radiation therapy was delayed, and she was unable to pick up her five-year-old daughter who was waiting for her mother at a bus stop.

Helpless and panic stricken with worry, the young mother of two thought to herself that no other parent should have to go through this type of stress when being treated for a life-threatening illness.

Solomon lost her battle against cancer just a few short years ago, but before the disease took her life, she was able to leave behind a legacy, which today helps other cancer patients and their children avoid the nightmarish situation Solomon faced that day.

That legacy is a daycare centre called the Magic Castle. Run by the Psychosocial Oncology program on the ground level of Princess Margaret Hospital, Magic Castle not only cares for children while their parents or other relatives are being treated for cancer, but also teaches them about the disease that in some way threatens to destroy their young lives.

Though when it first opened in 1996, Magic Castle was run intermittently, as it relied on volunteers, the program has morphed into something so unique that it's the first of its kind in an adult hospital in Canada, says Dr. Gary Rodin, head of the Psychosocial Oncology program.

"The intent of the program is to draw attention to the impact of cancer on the whole family," says Rodin. "In the past, [the hospital] focused more on the patient; children have been the least visible part," though cancer can have a devastating impact on their lives as well.

When Magic Castle opened full time in January 2001, the hospital enlisted the help of child life specialist Morgan Williams, who interned at the daycare in 1997-98 while earning her degree in early childhood education.

While interning, she says she quickly realized that more than just a daycare centre was needed. "I found that the children were anxious about why they were here and why they were in the hospital. I felt that the direction we needed to take was more of a therapeutic-play approach."

She has developed creative ways to make children feel comfortable in the hospital, and help them to overcome their fear of their parent who is suffering from cancer.

"We use bubbles to explain what cancer is. The big bubbles that are nice and whole and round are the good cells, and cancer cells are the clumped-together bubbles. I enlist the children to pop those cancer cells and fight the cancer," she explains.

Rodin says that through play and conversation around the play, "children are able to express their fears and concerns in a supportive environment."

As for parents, Williams says that Magic Castle allows them to feel relief in knowing that their children are being watched "in a secure, safe and fun environment."

While this service has proven to be invaluable, being well used and well received by families, it is run completely on private donations.

Rodin says that because the program is so new, the hospital has yet to assess the importance of Magic Castle and allocate the funds needed to keep it running. But Rodin is unsure whether Magic Castle will ever receive hospital funding, as the hospital has many competing expenses and a finite budget.

As a result, Magic Castle is at risk of dying, as funds to keep it going are quickly diminishing.

A few months ago, leaders of the psychosocial program approached hospital committee member Sheila Geist about the dilemma.

"When I heard about the program and how it was in need of money, it was like I was hit over the head with a baseball bat," says Geist. "I couldn't sleep until I found a way to raise the money to keep the program running."

And in fact, running is her solution. Geist turned to Canada Fit, a running group that trains members for marathons, and then finds sponsors, who donate money to a specific cause.

Recently, the organization pledged its help to Magic Castle for as long as it's needed. Canada Fit's goal is to raise $100,000, and its 200 members will be running in three marathons in mid and late October in an effort to raise those funds. The first of those marathons is called the Canada International Marathon, which will be held in Toronto on Oct. 14.

Geist says people touched by the story of the Magic Castle have been sending donations to the Princess Margaret Hospital Foundation, and Canada Fit, whose members train in Toronto, Mississauga and Oakville, will be looking for new members to run, and thus raise funds, in the spring when the new training season begins.

Though the Canada Fit marathon co-ordinator is unsure as to whether her group will be able to raise the target amount this year, Geist has made it her goal to keep "pounding the pavement" until Magic Castle has a permanent supply of funds.

About Nutrition

By LISA WEINBERG

Q. My 21-year-old son regularly drinks 48 ounces of apple juice per day. He doesn't have a weight problem. Is this excessive?

A. Since he doesn't have a weight problem you don't have to reduce it, but it is excessive: 48 ounces of apple juice are likely contributing almost 800 calories to his daily intake, most of which are empty calories. The other concern is what the juice is replacing. If he is drinking so much juice, he probably isn't drinking very much milk or water. I would suggest he give some thought to reducing or diluting his apple juice.

Environmental isssues discussed during Sukkot

VANCOUVER — During the weeklong harvest festival of Sukkot, Jews around the province will gather at synagogues to celebrate in the traditional manner, and to examine the impact of factory-farming, genetically-modified foods and pesticide use on the local environment.

Adam va-Adamah, British Columbia's Jewish environmental group, will deliver its innovative Sukkot program which combines traditional teachings of Sukkot with modern issues related to agricultural production.

This program aimed at Jewish children, teens and adults will feature games, discussions, and arts and crafts.

Now in its second year, the Adam va-Adamah Sukkot program reached over 250 participants last autumn. This year's program will contain new information on genetically modified food and Jewish perspectives on this controversial topic.

"Increasingly, Jews and all peoples of faith, are recognizing that our responsibilities extend beyond traditional worship, and include consciousness and positive action to preserve the environment," said Alan Morinis, chair of Adam va-Adamah.

"Our tradition possesses clues and guidance as to how to best play our role as steward of the earth," he said. Sukkot has traditionally celebrated people's connection with nature through building a sukkah and decorating it with gourds, corn and branches.

As the natural agricultural season draws to a close and winter begins, the open sukkah serves as a reminder of our connection and dependancy on nature.

With the help of Farm Folk/City Folk, a Vancouver-based urban agriculture advocacy group, Adam va-Adamah plans to make the 3,000-year-old tradition of Sukkot relevant for Jews in B.C. today, said Morinis.

Canadian tumbler finishes eighth in world tournament

By NEIL BECKER
Special to The CJN

TORONTO — Gifted and hard-working athletes like Richmond Hill native Laurie Reingold consistently demonstrate the ability to return from a lengthy absence and still excel in their sport.

Reingold, who recently returned to Canadian soil after finishing eighth in the Power Tumbling World Age Group Championships in Denmark, has virtually picked up where she left off 4½ years ago when she was among the top tumblers in Canada.

In the intervening years, she took a sabbatical from tumbling to study at the University Of Guelph.

"I really didn't know what to expect because I haven't been to an international meet in five years. My main goal was to stay on my feet and have some fun. I was happy with the results," the 24-year-old psychology major said.

Tumbling, which is dominated by ex-gymnasts from countries like France, Russia and South Africa, consists of set routines in which athletes propel themselves from a springboard apparatus that is 1½ metres wide and spans 26 metres in length. They soar higher than a basketball goal while performing somersaults with multiple flips and twists, demonstrating acrobatic speed, strength and skill.

Laurie Reingold

Even though each routine takes approximately three seconds, months of intense training and personal sacrifice go into every major event. Reingold, who trained under coach and former national gymnast Chris Hanley at the Markham Gymnastics Club, was no exception.

"We trained four days a week for two hours. Right before the competition we train five days per week," she said.

In order to qualify for the honour of competing in Denmark, Reingold had to place in the top four in Canada in the 17-and-over category. That qualifying meet took place in British Columbia earlier this year.

The events in Odense, Denmark, were judged by a panel of qualified judges from participating countries.

"Our routines are judged on the level of difficulty and how well we execute each pass," Reingold said.

Unfortunately for Reingold – who hopes her sport will one day become more recognized among the general public – the World Age Group championships were not televised. There is an increasing amount of interest in the sport around the world, while in Canada, the greatest athlete participation can be found in Alberta and Ontario.

Once she was done competing, Reingold spent some of her free time sightseeing and shopping.

"In Denmark, everyone speaks English, so communicating was not a problem. They all seemed really happy to have us here visiting and competing," she said.

Reingold, who runs a window cleaning company, decided to stay overseas for a couple of weeks to travel with another Canadian athlete. They spent some time in Germany and Finland.

With the four-day tournament behind her, this ambitious athlete has already set new goals for the upcoming season.

"I would like to learn a couple of new skills that will help me to qualify for the nationals being held in Alberta in 2002," she said.

Besides perfecting her routines, this veteran tumbler, who is among the most experienced in her club, is an inspiration to the younger athletes on the team. She will often give free advice to the other competitors during training.

"I'm older than the average female tumbler in Canada, but there have been many tumblers who have proven that you can continue to do this sport into your late 20s. As long as you remain in good physical shape, age shouldn't be a deterrent," she said.

In the meantime, it's time to reflect and enjoy the experience of participating in Denmark and finishing eighth in a field of 36 competitors.

"I was pleased with the results of this meet, but no matter how well I do, I always feel that there is some room for improvement," she said.

Italian soccer team tries to overcome racist fans

By RUTH E. GRUBER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

ROME — An Italian soccer team with a history of racist and anti-Semitic fans is working to replace that image with one of unity.

The Lazio team of Rome joined Israel's Maccabi Haifa and Asec Mimosas of the Ivory Coast in the Shalom Cup, a tournament aimed at combating racism and promoting inter-ethnic harmony.

Asec Mimosas won the three-way tournament, held in Rome's Olympic Stadium recently.

Lazio's participation in the high-profile match demonstrates "a commitment that we want to carry forward on a long-term basis," said Sergio Cragnotti, the club's president. "Fighting against racism and violence must be a lesson for everyone, beginning with young people."

In recent years, Lazio fans have come under fire for using racist and anti-Semitic slogans against opposing teams. Three groups of Lazio fans boycotted the Shalom Cup, calling it "improbable" and "anachronistic."

Anti-Semitic banner unfurled

Only some 8,000 people attended the matches, but a large banner reading "Racism Is Disgusting" dominated the stands.

"Even if it is acting late after years of guilty tolerance of its militant fans, Lazio has recently been doing everything to make up for lost time," wrote Stefano Boldrini in the La Gazzetta dello Sport newspaper.

In addition to participating in the Shalom Cup, Lazio members have made visits to Jewish schools, donned T-shirts with anti-racism slogans and spoken out publicly against militant fans.

The round-robin tournament was marred by one incident.

At one point, a banner reading, "Against Zionist Racism for a True Peace, Intifada Until Victory" was briefly unfurled in the stands.

A few years back, in a match between Lazio and arch-rival Roma – a team supported by many Jews – Lazio fans displayed a banner that told Roma fans, "Auschwitz Is Your Homeland; The Ovens Are Your Home."

That and similar incidents led authorities and soccer officials to say they would crack down on the fans or stop matches if the disruptive behaviour continued.

About Teens

Dear Karilani,

I have recently become a vegetarian, and my family still cannot understand why I have given up meat. My mother constantly complains how hard it is to come up with vegetarian meals, and she tries to persuade me to "just try the chicken." My father is convinced that I cannot possibly be healthy without meat and my younger sister thinks shoving a hot dog in my face is a funny joke. I am tired of my family not respecting my decision. What should I do about it?

Misunderstood Vegetable

Dear Misunderstood,

Your family's reactions are not uncommon. It is not that they do not respect you, but they cannot relate to your choice of diet. Instead of getting angry at your mother when she offers you chicken, offer her some of your own food.

Start cooking your own meals, so that she does not have to make anything separate for you. As well, you may want to try cooking a vegetarian meal for your family. This way, they can try some of the foods you like and they will see that there are options beyond meat.

Show your father the foods you are going to eat to replace meat. Explain to him that while meat is healthy, you are able to find the nutrients you need in other places. Tell him that foods such as beans, tofu and peanut butter are high in protein, and are a healthy alternative to meat. Offer to go to a nutritionist if he is still worried about you. The nutritionist will be able to give you a meal plan to ensure that you eat well on a regular basis.

As for your sister, just let her teasing pass. She is probably just looking for ways to bother you, and she obviously succeeded. Just don't let her know that it upsets you and she'll soon move onto something else.

Dear Karilani is written on a rotating basis by three high school students. The drawing is a composite. We welcome questions from our readers. Please mail, e-mail or fax them to The CJN.

AMIA trial begins in Argentina

By FLORENCIA ARBISER
Jewish Telegraphic Agency

BUENOS AIRES — A trial that began here last week for 20 people accused of playing a role in the 1994 bombing of the AMIA Jewish community centre has taken on additional significance following the terror attacks against the World Trade Center and Pentagon.

"Terrorism is a worldwide threat to democracy and tolerance," Jacob Kovadloff, a representative of the American Jewish Committee, said before entering the courtroom on Monday of last week.

"At this time, there is a great deal of concern around the world how Argentina will deal with this issue."

The AMIA attack killed 85 people and wounded some 300 others.

Security was tight as the trial began in the Argentine capital.

Police vans drove with sirens blaring toward the court. Two police dogs trained to sniff out explosives walked the court corridors. An ambulance was parked at the front door.

To get inside, it was necessary to walk about a half-mile within green fences that surrounded the federal court building.

Inside, doctors in green scrubs wore stethoscopes around their necks. Three metal detector machines guarded the entrance to the courtroom. Every bag was checked at least two times. Credentials that were necessary to get into the courtroom were checked by magnifying glass and ultraviolet light to verify their authenticity.

Police said 200 agents were on hand to ensure security.

The "measures became stronger after the attacks against the World Trade Center and Pentagon," police inspector Gustavo Palazzo said.

Echoes of U.S. terror attacks

The basement of the court building in downtown Buenos Aires had a courtroom specially built for the trial – and it was packed on the trial's first day.

In attendance were three federal judges, four prosecutors, the 20 defendants, dozens of lawyers, victims' relatives, politicians and reporters.

Also inside the courtroom were local Jewish community leaders and Israel's ambassador to Argentina, Benjamin Oron.

Before the trial began, Pablo Jacoby, lawyer for Memoria Activa, a group of victims' relatives, asked for a minute of silence for those killed in four terror attacks – the two earlier this month in the United States; the July 1994 AMIA blast; and an earlier attack, in March 1992, on the Israeli Embassy in Buenos Aires that killed 29 people and injured more than 200.

ISRAEL

Terror Reduction

JERUSALEM — Foreign Minister Shimon Peres told Israeli Radio last week that Palestinian Authority President Yasser Arafat's efforts to quell violence had resulted in a "drastic" reduction in Palestinian attacks. Hours after Peres spoke, however, a mortar bomb was fired at an army post in the Gaza Strip, causing no casualties or damage.

Bin Laden Lashes Out

JERUSALEM — A statement believed sent by terror suspect Osama bin Laden to a TV station based in Qatar lashed out at a "Jewish campaign" against him while expressing sympathy for Muslims killed in anti-U.S. demonstrations in Pakistan. "We hope that they are the first martyrs in Islam's battle in this era against the new crusade and Jewish campaign led by the big crusader Bush under the flag of the cross," the statement said.

Clocks Set Back

JERUSALEM — Israel turned its clocks back by one hour last month. Eastern Daylight Savings Time is now six hours earlier than in Israel, but there will again be a seven-hour time difference between the two zones once clocks are turned back an hour in Canada Oct. 28.

WORLD

DJs Blast Jews, Israel

NEW YORK — The hosts of a popular sports radio program here have suggested that American Jews should take a loyalty oath either to the United States or Israel, in light of the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks on the World Trade Centre and the Pentagon, according to the New York Post. Mike Francesca and Chris Russo, hosts of the Mike and the Mad Dog show on WFAN, said on the air that they felt U.S. support for Israel was responsible for the terrorist attacks.

Teens Beaten

MOSCOW — Ten teenaged yeshiva students were attacked by a group of skinheads recently. The teens were coming from a Lubavitch-run yeshiva at the Marina Roscha Synagogue when the skinheads shouted anti-Semitic slurs, beat some of the students and threatened to come and "sort things out" at the synagogue. Police are investigating. Also last month, vandals spray-painted Nazi graffiti and anti-Semitic slogans at the entrance to Moscow's Choral Synagogue.

Babi Yar Memorial

KIEV — Some 2,000 people gathered Sept. 23 at the Babi Yar memorial in Ukraine to mark the 60th anniversary of the Nazi massacre of nearly 34,000 Jews during three days in September 1941. Later that day, a requiem commemorating the massacre was performed at the Kiev Opera Theater, where Ukrainian government officials were in attendance.

New OU Head

NEW YORK — The Orthodox Union (OU) has appointed Rabbi Tzvi Hersh Weinreb of Baltimore as its new executive vice-president. A widely respected scholar and orator, Rabbi Weinreb is also a psychotherapist who has campaigned to place social issues, including domestic violence, on the Orthodox agenda. Until his appointment at the OU, he was spiritual leader of the 400-family member Congregation Shomrei Emunah in Baltimore.

Shul Near Ground Zero Thrives

NEW YORK — The destruction of the World Trade Center may have shut down much of Lower Manhattan, but business is booming at the Wall Street Synagogue, a short walk from ground zero. A recent visit found a packed sanctuary during back-to-back afternoon minyans at the 80-year-old Orthodox synagogue.

Many worshippers, mostly workers in surrounding government and financial offices, were still shell-shocked from the Sept. 11 attack, but a few said they were more compelled than ever to use the Beekman Street synagogue.

On the day of the attack, the synagogue became a haven for displaced workers,, said Rabbi Meyer Hager, who has led the congregation for more than 30 years. "It was the most horrible scene I' ll ever see," said the rabbi. "People were streaming into the shul to use the phone, to call their families. Some came to say tehillim."

An emergency generator powered the lights for Rosh Hashahah services. Normal power resumed last week, although the shul' s phones are still out.

Karen Mock will fight racism in a new venue

Moving from League for Human Rights to Canadian Race Relations Foundation

By FRANCES KRAFT
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Even as a child, Karen Mock always wanted to be a teacher. Indirectly, that passion led her to B'nai Brith Canada's League for Human Rights, where she served for 12 years until last week as its national director.

On Oct. 15, Mock, who has published extensively on multiculturalism and race relations, will become executive director of the Toronto-based Canadian Race Relations Foundation (CRRF). Her three-year appointment was announced by the office of Hedy Fry, Secretary of State (Multiculturalism) (Status of Women).

Mock's "national and international reputation, network and expertise will contribute a great deal to our collaborative efforts to eliminate racism and racial discrimination," Fry said in a news release.

Originally headed toward a career in the classroom, Mock's career path took an unexpected turn when she decided in her student days that she wanted to teach teachers.

Later, as a professor of education, she included in her work the impact of culture and ethnicity, which was related to the research she did for her doctorate in psychology.

"Before there was a field called multicultural, anti-racist education, I included it." Her student teachers needed to be able to change their teaching styles to address the diversity of students' cultural backgrounds, she explained.

Twelve years ago, Mock felt the time was right to make a career move. She was drawn to the League in part because of her teenage involvement with BBYO and the Anti-Defamation League, but also because "it was a pivotal time. Just as there was a move to more define the field of anti-racism ... it was my way of ensuring that anti-Semitism would be on the agenda."

Now she feels it is again time to move on to a third phase in her career. "I feel I have made my contribution here."

At the League, Mock had what she described as a "very collegial relationship" with the CRRF. The foundation was formed in 1996 as part of a package of redress from Ottawa for Japanese Canadians relating to their treatment in World War II (part of which included a $24 million endowment for the foundation). In her capacity as League director, Mock oversaw two CRRF public education projects.

Sitting in her B'nai Brith Canada office surrounded by books, plaques, anti-racism posters and boxes, Mock said that although it was early to say what her priorities would be at the CRRF, she would be building on its prior work, helping the foundation to gain a higher profile and fulfil its mandate of providing leadership and serving as a clearinghouse and source of information and resources.

Poets of our past

From the editor's desk

It is the destiny of the Jewish people always to be "tuned in" to the news. It was ever thus and always will be. After millennia of dispersion, our "antennae" are fully extended, on "alert" to receive and then interpret the myriad developments at home and abroad to determine "how they affect our community."

Of course, lately, the news, dominated by the atrocities of Sept. 11, has been horrible.

Though we cannot and dare not ignore the news, we can occasionally take a respite from it, and in so doing, strengthen ourselves for the next time we must deal with the things we cannot ignore.

Last May, Mosaic Press of Oakville, Ont., published a small collection of poetry that I effusively recommend to all persons who like reading poetry, who have a fondness for what was the Yiddish culture of European Jewry and who are interested in Jewish history.

Simcha Simchovitch, the renowned, award-winning, octogenarian Yiddish poet has translated 88 of Mordecai Gebirtig's poems into a handsome volume called The Song That Never Died: The Poetry of Mordecai Gebirtig. Raymond Souster helped Simchovitch in editing the volume.

Gebirtig was one of the most beloved poets of his era and his people. His songs were read and sung by a great many of Europe's Jews, who found in the poems both a faithful reflection of everyday shtetl life and a harbinger of hope for a better future.

Reading Gebirtig is like peering through a window of a time capsule into the world of European Jewry that Hitler destroyed. But through these poems by Gebirtig that Simchovich has translated, the "feel" of that world – its everyday pain, pleasure and poignancy – survives for us.

Gebirtig's characters are finely crafted and fully developed in the poet's brilliant mastery of nuance and understatement.

How can we not be moved by the tale of Avreml the thief, who, like Jean Valjean of Hugo's Les Miserables, was put in jail for stealing a loaf of bread? How can we not shed a tear when we read the epoch-marking poem Our Town is Burning?

But the poetry is not the only treasure of this work. Simchovitch has written a 15-page essay on the life and poetry of Gebirtig, which forms the introduction of the collection.

True to Simchovitch's deep scholarship and careful style, he provides the reader, from the first-hand vantage of a Holocaust survivor, an informative primer on Gebirtig and the times in which Gebirtig lived, written with love and a poet's gift for language .

The Song That Never Died: The Poetry of Mordecai Gebirtig is a wonderful book.

A.M. Klein was a kindred spirit of the cultured, Yiddish, poetic soul that Gebirtig personified.

Born in Ukraine in 1909, Abraham Moses Klein came as an infant with his family to the unique, bustling new world possibilities of bilingual and bicultural Montreal.

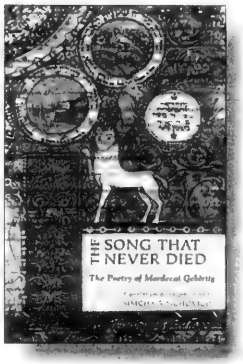
In Montreal, Klein rose as a poet, writer, orator of exceptional genius whose voluminous writings and works would gain wide national acclaim. Alas, he fell into a deep emotional and psychological depression that would still his voice for the last 20 years of his life. He died in 1972.

Arnold Bennett a writer and dramatist in St. John's has directed and produced a documentary about the life of A.M. Klein called The Messiah from Montreal.

With rare creative force, the documentary hits the viewer right between the emotional eyes. It is a highly imaginative, original presentation that tells the grippingly tragic story of Klein in a tri-part harmony of poetry, drama and narration.

Thirteen of Klein's poems are recited in the documentary. But each poem is compellingly dramatized, sometimes sung, to very moving effect.

Tying each of the poems together in a tear-stained, chronological weave of the poet's extraordinarily accomplished and sadly quixotic life is an incisive narration read by the late Al Waxman.



Waxman is simply superlative.

As if he had been privy to the deepest secrets of the poet's tormented soul, he conveys Klein's life story with profound affection and delicate insight.

Klein's poems resound with special meaning for us as Jews and as Canadians. That they are "explained" to us by Al Waxman in the last special feature before he passed away adds a haunting and beautiful poignancy to our appreciation of A.M. Klein.

Messiah from Montreal will be aired in the coming days in the Toronto area and in Montreal. Readers should consult local listings.

Palestinian terrorist still in Canada after 14 years

By PAUL LUNGEN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Shortly after the terrorist attacks that destroyed the World Trade Center, Citizenship and Immigration Minister Elinor Caplan responded to concerns about Canada's immigration and refugee system by stating: "Our laws are amongst the toughest in the world when it comes to inadmissibility for criminality and terrorism."

Somewhere in Brantford, Ont., Mahmoud Mohammad Issa Mohammad might have done a double take when he heard of the minister's tough line on terror. A onetime gunman with the Popular Front for the Liberation of Palestine (PFLP), Mohammad has lived in Canada 14 years, and for 13 of those years his immigration case has wound its way through the Canadian legal system.

Back in 1968, Mohammad and an accomplice hijacked an El Al jetliner, threw a grenade at the plane and raked it with machine gun fire. One Israeli passenger was killed and a Greek court sentenced Mohammad to 17 years in jail.

Mohammad, now 58, served less than one year before he was released when fellow PFLP terrorists hijacked a second plane and demanded his release in exchange for sparing the new group of hostages. The Greek government caved in and Mohammad was released.

In 1987, the PFLP gunman entered Canada without revealing his terrorist past. Despite later efforts by the Canadian government to remove him, his case remains bogged down in legal manoeuvres. Today, Mohammad is trying to make a refugee claim.

The never-ending story has angered Canadian Jewish Congress.

> 'It's a case of outrageous delay in affecting justice'
> – Congress

"It's outrageous," said Congress spokesperson Eric Vernon. "It's a thumb in the eye. It's a case of outrageous delay in affecting justice."

Congress, which has been lobbying for tougher anti-terrorism legislation, wants to see the Mohammad case handled expeditiously, and it's urging the government to take a number of other steps to enhance Canadians' security in the light of terrorist threats.

It has advocated strengthening the country's security services, including the RCMP, CSIS and the investigations arm of the Immigration Department; it supports giving immigration officers greater powers to detain arrivals with links to terrorist groups; and it backs a continental border defence against terrorism.

Last week, federal authorities announced tougher border screening procedures as part of its response to the World Trade Center attacks.

Congress believes the government, by taking a harsher line in the Mohammad case while introducing a comprehensive anti-terrorism strategy "on an urgent basis," would signal a tough new stand against terrorism, Vernon said.

The Mohammad case "is a symbol of how seriously they are taking this issue. They must end the farce of Mohammad's extended stay in Canada as expeditiously as possible. The presence of this man makes a mockery of any claim by our government that they wish to combat terrorism, both on an international basis and in rooting out fund-raising and support cells that exist in Canada," Vernon said.

"Mohammad is a living example of the government's inability to remove from Canada a man convicted of manslaughter as part of a terrorist action," he added.

Rene Mercier, a spokesperson for Citizenship and Immigration, declined to comment on details of the Mohammad case, saying information that has not been revealed in court would violate the Privacy Act. He attributed the length of the case to "due process. We're following a process. It's not always easy."

While there is no hard evidence that any of the World Trade Center bombers entered the United States through Canada, several recent cases suggest Canada is a comfortable staging ground for other Islamic extremists. Ahmed Ressam, the Algerian-born terrorist caught at the U.S. border with a carload of explosives and a map of the Los Angeles airport, lived for several years in Montreal after having his refugee claim rejected.

Law enforcement agencies have identified some of Ressam's radical Muslim accomplices who also lived in Montreal.

There are other Canadian connections.

Last week, France put on trial Said Atmani, a Moroccan who trained with Osama bin Laden and lived in Montreal for three years after his refugee claim was rejected. France alleges he was the right-hand man to Fateh Kamel, an Algerian-born Canadian convicted in Paris of aiding terrorists.

Meanwhile, two Egyptians, allegedly with ties to the radical Islamic group Al Jihad, have been arrested in Toronto. The Egypt-based Al Jihad reportedly is linked to bin Laden's Al Qaeda terrorist network. One of the men worked for a short time in the Bathurst Jewish Community Centre.

In Chicago, police arrested Nabil Al-Marabh, a former Toronto resident, in connection with their investigation into the World Trade Centre bombings.

Faith groups across Canada fast for child poverty

By CAROLYN BLACKMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — Faith groups across the country took part this past week in the End Child Poverty Fast to call attention to the estimated one in five Canadian children living in poverty.

In anticipation of Thanksgiving and the United Nations' World Food Day Oct. 16, the initiative began on Yom Kippur and ran until today. Participants were asked to fast for one day or skip a meal, as well as to call their member of Parliament to explain how Ottawa will follow up on its commitment in last January's throne speech to end child poverty.

Organizers of the fast included the Campaign Against Child Poverty, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, The Canadian Council of Churches, the Catholic Religious Conference and the Citizens for Public Justice.

A letter co-written by Keith Landy, president, Canadian Jewish Congress (CJC); Rabbi Reuven Bulka, chair of religious and inter-religious affairs, CJC; and Rabbi Arthur Bielfeld, a member of the Campaign Against Child Poverty steering committee, was sent to rabbis across the country.

Rabbis were asked to speak about child poverty from the pulpit during the High Holy Days, to ask their congregants to pray for Canadian families living in poverty, and to encourage congregants to write their local member of the provincial legislature asking what steps have been taken to alleviate child poverty in their province.

"These are difficult days for many low-income people and poor families living with children. Poverty is a crisis of the spirit as much as a crisis of misery. While this initiative will not end that misery tomorrow, it is a word of hope to the poor that they have not been forgotten," the letter said.

Rabbi Larry Englander, spiritual leader of Solel Congregation, said that "as we fasted on Yom Kippur, we not only made the statement that we were fasting for forgiveness of our sins, but for the collective sin of allowing our children to starve.

"We are hoping that we can prompt our elected officials to do something [about the situation]," he said.

Some members of the congregation helped out on the Native Men's Residence (Na Me Res) Street Help van after Yom Kippur, he said, because they realized that it could be a difficult evening to attract volunteers.

Members of Temple Kol Ami have been asked to fast an additional day to show solidarity for the initiative, said Rabbi Daniel Gottlieb. "It is also the practice of our members on Yom Kippur to bring in perishable food items to donate to food banks – food they are giving up on Yom Kippur. A letter- writing campaign is planned for after the Holy Days," he said.

Carly Steinman, social action co-ordinator, Canadian Council for Reform Judaism, said that as people fasted, they would recognize that many mothers are forced to go hungry at the end of the month so that their children can eat.

"Too many Canadian children go to school hungry due to poverty; too many families in our communities lack safe, affordable housing," she said.

There have been many previous initiatives, she said, "and they have been important and they have helped. What is required of Canada is a change of heart, and what is required of our political leaders is a call to political conscience to do more ... much more.

"Through prayer and fasting, we hope to rekindle our commitment to work for justice and serve our neighbours in need. Through prayer and fasting we hope for a greater solidarity among all Canadians that will encourage a bolder response and a stronger commitment from those in elected office.

"The prophet Isaiah asks what is the true fast that we desire – is it not to loosen the bonds of injustice, to share your bread with the hungry, and bring the homeless poor into your house," Steinman said.

"He is challenging us to consider why we fast, to make the link between spirituality and action. The End Child Poverty Fast challenges me to make this link on Yom Kippur – to have a meaningful fast and then to go forward and act."

TORONTO — New York police arrested a Toronto woman Sept. 26 for allegedly signing a notarized document stating falsely that her husband was in the World Trade Center when it collapsed.

Sara Hekriy, 44, of North York, was charged with perjury on Sept. 26.

Hekriy's story was alluded to by Rabbi Michael Dolgin in a Sept. 23 memorial service here, when he dedicated a psalm to the man's memory.

When truth gives way to falsehood

In no other conflicted region of the world is truth turned on its head as much as it is in the Middle East. Three situations arose last weekend to illustrate the point. First was the announcement by officials in Qatar that representatives of the 56-nation Organization of Islamic States (OIC) will soon be meeting in that Persian Gulf state to develop a united stand in the event of a U.S.- led strike against Afghanistan.

The meeting has been requested by Iran's president Mohammed Khatami. His foreign minister, Kamal Kharrazi, explained Iran's point of view during a meeting over the weekend in Lebanon.

"We [Iran and Lebanon] have similar stands regarding condemning the attacks on the United States and combating terrorism. We both agreed that the concept of terrorism should be identified and it should be distinguished from national liberation movements," Kharrazi said. "It is very important that this [OIC] meeting reaches a unified stand toward these developments and the ways to co-operate with the international group to fight terrorism." (Our emphasis.)

Every violent, fundamentalist, extremist, radical Islamist terror group passes through Iran, is supported in some manner by Iran, and is encouraged wholeheartedly by Iran to kill Israelis and Jews. Iran's idea of co-operation in the fight against terrorism is to ensure OIC cooperation in the effort to obliterate the Jewish State. The chief sponsors of world terror are now co-operating to "fight" it!

Second was the "ceasefire" announced last Wednesday by Shimon Peres and Yasser Arafat. By Sunday night, during that ceasefire, nine Palestinians had been killed and 11 Israelis wounded. Apparently, Arafat's military and security forces decided to trump the ceasefire because of the need to commemorate the one year anniversary of their violent rejection of Israel's peace proposal at Camp David. They therefore sent the Palestinian "street" into action with "standard" demonstration equipment such as rocks and small arms. But they also fired mortar rounds and hurled grenades at IDF forces over the weekend and this, of course, provoked a strong military response by the IDF. Israeli security officials have noted with frustration and anger that Arafat again refused to give the order to arrest suspected terrorists despite his promise to Peres last week that he would.

Third was the surrealistic disclosure that Reuters News Agency's international desk had decided to refrain from referring to the atrocities of Sept. 11 as acts perpetrated by terrorists. The Reuters' spokesman perversely explained that one person's terrorist is another's "freedom fighter." Can anyone find any logic in this decision other than the logic of saving one's reporting staff from a bully's threats? Yet by surrendering to the bully, Reuters has effectively handed over its pen to the bully. And having done that, Reuters has handed over a great deal more than its pen.

Truth has given way to falsehood; integrity to ignominy.

Deplores Simcoe's advice

G.K. Simcoe has learned nothing at all from the bitter Jewish experiences of the 20th century ("A low profile, the best profile," CJN, Sept. 20).

In stating the Israeli case, Israeli public relations and the Diaspora leadership have both been a dismal failure. Worldwide media has, for the most part and with precious few exceptions, disseminated and swallowed Arab propaganda for the past 50 years and more.

Now when Jews can speak freely and fearlessly in almost every news medium, where are our trained, articulate spokespersons? Preaching to the converted in The CJN does little good.

Where are the Jewish Émile Zolas, those indignant vociferous writers and journalists who should carefully and accurately be rebutting every Arab lie over and over again – whose outrage cannot allow them merely to accept your advice to "say nothing" ?

I deplore Simcoe's ghetto mentality advice. Silence in the face of injustice and racial hatred only encourages the perpetrators.

Every Jew who can lift a pen or punch a keyboard should speak out and not "say nothing," as he proclaims in his column.

Israel's humanitarianism

I am writing regarding the ongoing debate over the plight of Afghan refugees stranded at sea looking for a place where someone will admit them.

A similar event took place several years ago when a boat with Vietnamese refugees was drifting at sea desperately trying to find a refuge, but there was no country, large or small, willing to give them asylum.

Their lamentable odyssey ended only after a captain of an Israeli boat, on instruction of the Israeli government, took the refugees in and brought them to Israel.

This humanitarian act speaks for itself, ringing loud and clear.

Arab reaction to attacks not shocking

Many Arab countries have sent condolences over the deaths that have taken place in New York and Washington as a result of the terrorist attack on Sept. 11.

We have also been shown pictures of Yasser Arafat giving blood in order to show his support of the United States. Are we supposed to believe that these actions are sincere and that they were really shocked by the terrorist attack?

These are the same leaders who have never taken any action to stop the protests in their countries where the American flag has been trampled on and burnt, and where posters have been displayed showing "America is Satan" and "Down with America." They permit their religious leaders to spew out venomous hatred every week from their mosques!

Federation should help shul-goers

There is a clear need for UJA Federation of Greater Toronto to become involved in helping to underwrite the cost of tickets to synagogue services for the High Holy Days for persons who otherwise cannot afford to attend.

The need for such assistance is understood by the fact that a messianic group such as Melech Yisroel is presently offering free tickets to its High Holy Day services. The Jewish Federation of Greater Miami offers such assistance to persons who otherwise could not attend shul on the yomim tovim.

Hence, for the Toronto federation to render such aid would not be unique, and would constitute fulfilment of a policy which it has considered, but not implemented to date.

Canada was needed at conference

I beg to take issue with both the announcement of the Canadian Jewish Congress and the opinion of its president, Keith Landy, that Canada should not have stayed at the conference in Durban.

The fact is that staying at the conference enabled our country to moderate the language of its final declaration and to contradict some of its text.

I should, therefore, ask Jews to commend the delegation for staying throughout the conference and contributing a voice of reason to its proceedings.

Physician, Heal Thyself: A Sukkot Story

By ELI RUBENSTEIN

When Rabbi Israel Salanter began his speeches, he would often tell his audience, "If only one person in this room is convinced of the truth of my words, if only one person has a change of heart because of my message, I will have achieved a great deal... even if that one person is me."

What Rabbi Salanter was teaching us (and himself) is that a teacher often needs to pay attention to his or her own message. In modern parlance, this thought is echoed by the quote: One who teaches learns twice.

Which leads me to this Sukkot story, a story which I feel compelled to share with you – and myself.

Some years ago, my elderly and frail aunt finally was forced to give up her apartment and move into a nursing home. I had planned to visit her on a regular basis, but somehow never seemed to get around to it. There was always something more important, more immediate that had to be taken care of. After all, I could visit my aunt at any time – her dance card wasn't exactly full.

Moreover, my aunt, even at her best, was never great fun to be with, and the nursing home was a drab and dreary place, populated by many terminal and gravely ill residents. Perhaps, on an unconscious level, it reminded me of my own mortality, giving me further cause to avoid visiting.

The holiday of Sukkot approached, and I had some time off work. During the holiday that mandates Jews to make a personal pilgrimage to Jerusalem, I pledged to myself to make my own personal pilgrimage to my aunt's bedside.

But, yet again, other activities took precedence. My aunt would have to wait longer to see me.

But not much longer.

That Sukkot, I was teaching some of the basics of the holiday at my shul. I had brought along my own set of the arba minim (the four species we are commanded to acquire on Sukkot) to help explain the symbolism of the fruit.

Soon the discussion turned to the most favoured one of the four species, the etrog (citron). This fragrant, pear- shaped fruit is often subject to long hours of close inspection by observant Jews, who look for the one most exquisite with which to honour this precept.

> 'The lesson of the etrog is that all people are created b'tselem elokim'

Yet, oddly, among the factors that makes the etrog unfit for use (according to Jewish law) is not an esthetic flaw, but a rather minor deficiency. If the pitom, the remnant of the stem from where the blossom once grew, is broken, the etrog is not fit for use.

The obvious question was raised: Why should this crusted and dried-up part of the fruit, perhaps its most unattractive aspect, be so critical to the etrog's halachic viability?

The answer, I said (quoting the rabbis), is that we are being taught a lesson here. We often value people by their productivity, by their usefulness, by their external attractiveness. And by those criteria, we discount the elderly, those who are past their intellectual and physical prime, because, after all, what do they have to offer us?

The lesson of the etrog is that all people are created b'tselem elokim, that all of us are endowed with inalienable and life-long dignity and worth, regardless of what a given society's measure of value is.

We are all beautiful!

And so, we are warned that as we may not discard the pitom – the withered part of the etrog – so, too, we may not discard our elderly.

The audience listened to the lesson thoughtfully as I passed around the four species for them to examine. When I removed the etrog from its protective box and wrapping, I warned them to be extremely careful as they passed it from one person to the next, lest they accidentally break off the fragile pitom. Not trusting them fully, I watched out of the corner of my eye as my precious etrog rounded the room. And, then with a sigh of relief, I walked across the room and retrieved it from the last person, and gingerly placed it back in its case.

And then...!

As I was walking back to my seat, I stumbled. The fruit seemed to jump out of the box, bouncing onto the hard synagogue floor and rolling under a table. Anxiously, I scrambled to find it, hoping it had not suffered any lasting damage. I picked it up and examined it intently. It was absolutely fine, except for one small detail – the pitom had broken off during the mishap.

And I was the one careless enough to drop it...

And then the thought struck me. Had I been listening to my own words? Was I also being careless with the fragile elements in my own life? Was not I, also, guilty of discarding the elderly?

It was, as is said in educational circles, a "teachable moment" – except that I was the student and life was the teacher.

The very next day, I visited my aunt.

And for the next few months – until she passed away some three months later – I visited my aunt more often than I had done in the last few years.

Since that time, I have shared the story of my aunt and the fallen etrog with many others. I have often thought of it, especially when I fear I may not be following my own pronouncements.

Was the etrog meant to fall? Or was I reading a lesson into a mere accident?

I do not know. I will leave that to each reader to decide for him or herself.

But this much I do know. Sometimes we share stories and their lessons because others need to hear them. But many times we tell stories, because we ourselves – desperately, urgently – need to hear them.

And, if we are fortunate, sometimes we may even be listening.

Back from a visit to Israel

At the beginning of September, 10 days before Rosh Hashanah, a group of some 20 people set off for Israel. All of them were past chairs of the United Jewish Appeal, and it was my privilege, having chaired the UJA in 1970, to be amongst them.

Rabbi Gunther Plaut in Toronto

I knew that my children and friends were not keen about my joining this solidarity mission, given the volatile temper of the times. Other members of the mission reported the same sentiments. This was before Black Tuesday, when the attack on the United States took place. At the time of our leaving Toronto and arriving at Ben-Gurion airport after a flawless non-stop trip, that event was still part of an unknown future.

Because of my wife's persisting hospitalization, I had not been in Israel for some time and was glad for the opportunity to join a group of dedicated people. Our leaders were Julia Koshitzky, Gerry Halbert and Leo Goldhar, with Ted Sokolsky the competent representative of the UJA Federation staff. As in many enterprises, here, too, I was the oldest member, and felt very much at home amongst people whom I had known for many years.

If they harboured feelings of unease and insecurity, they did not share them in my hearing. I think all of us had made up our minds that it was a privilege to be in Israel at this trying time, for if Israelis could manage their lives, so could we during a short journey of less than a week.

Our program was packed with travelling to various parts of the country and with meeting important government representatives, journalists, academics and just plain people in various occupations.

Because of the Sept. 11 events, Prime Minister Ariel Sharon and former prime minister Benjamin Netanyahu cancelled their appointments with us. But there were plenty of fascinating cognoscenti to give us an insight into Israel's reality.

I never detected any worry or hesitation when we inspected the border with Lebanon, nor in our visit to Metulla, Israel's northernmost city, where we enjoyed visiting the Canada Centre – that splendid building featuring recreational activities. Neither did I notice any concern during our tour of the Golan Heights, when we were in sight of the Syrian border. Later on in the week, there was a drive-by shooting in Jerusalem in which a pedestrian was killed, but then, I remembered, in Toronto, a woman was run over by a careless driver while she was walking peacefully on the sidewalk. I could not help making that comparison. The fact that one event was planned and the other one was not, did not matter to the dead: in both cases they were random victims.

We found Israelis trying to make the best of their difficult situation. Their economy is bad and unemployment high; the absence of tourists is leaving its mark. My plea to you is simple: think of visiting, and the sooner the better.

In appreciation of Israel's heroes

A white van pulls to a sudden stop on Jaffa Street in downtown Jerusalem. Two men emerge, wearing blue helmets with thick plexiglass visors and dressed in green, heavily padded vests and pants. Only their lower arms and hands are exposed.

Ten minutes earlier, traffic was halted in both directions and pedestrians ordered away from the area where a suspicious-looking object in a shopping bag was left beside a bus shelter. As a precaution, merchants near the site evacuated their stores. With the area now cordoned off and cars backed up for blocks, thousands of people face a major disruption.

Robert Sarner in Jerusalem

The men from the van confer with a policeman who points them in the direction of the dubious bag. They attach long cables to the object in question, retreat a safe distance and then manipulate the cables to eventually blow up what might or might not be a bomb. The drama ends nearly an hour after it began as police give the all-clear sign and downtown springs back to its animated self.

Such a scenario, with slight variations, unfolds around the country, on average, several times a day. It's so common, it's almost a banal part of life. Yet it is anything but.

Few if any Israelis have been unaffected by the past year of Palestinian violence. Most devastated, of course, are the families and friends of the 80 Israeli men, women and children killed and the 2,000 others wounded in the Arab terrorist onslaught that began late last September.

Logically, those numbers should be much higher. It's not for want of trying by Palestinians hell-bent on murdering as many Israelis as possible. The casualties would be far greater if numerous attacks had not been aborted through a combination of luck, terrorist incompetence and most importantly, the efforts of a group of fearless men.

When it comes to planning bombing attacks, Palestinians are nothing if not prolific – and imaginative. They plant explosives in cars, garbage cans, bags, guitar cases and watermelons and then place them where they hope to cause the most carnage – in buses, shopping centres, supermarkets, pubs, discos, parks, cinemas. You name it, they've probably tried it.

The only thing often separating a planted bomb from a scene of mass murder is a sharp-eyed passerby who reports a suspicious-looking object to the police. The last line of defence is the police's bomb disposal unit whose members are known as sappers. On a moment's notice, they must race to a site, calmly assess the situation, determine if there's a bomb, and if so, neutralize it or conduct a controlled explosion. They do all this while knowing that with one wrong move they could blow themselves – and others – to smithereens.

Even in the best of times, when the Palestinians are not waging a concerted terrorist campaign against Israel, sappers have one of the most dangerous, high-pressure jobs in the country. Since the intifadah began 12 months ago, they have worked around the clock, dismantling countless bombs of every size.

The sappers are also called in immediately after a bombing attack to check for other explosive devices possibly planted in the vicinity by terrorists.

Against suicide bombers, there's little sappers can do if the terrorist is not caught before he detonates his deadly charges.

Sometimes the sappers are helped through the use of a special robot. But more often than not they can rely only on their nerves of steel, delicate hands, laser-like concentration and unyielding courage to save scores of lives every day. Much of this goes largely unreported, barely making it into the national news. A check of the archives at the Jerusalem Post for articles published over the past 10 years on Israel's sappers turned up little except the odd reference to them in news stories.

Such is the reality in Israel that we usually take the sappers for granted.

As the country now sadly marks the first anniversary of the Palestinian terrorist war against Israel, it's seems long overdue that we salute those who risk their lives to make our lives less dangerous. Prominent among these heroes are the sappers who deserve our profound thanks.

The scapegoat factor

Some flawed aspect of human nature demands a scapegoat for disappointments and problems. If a neighbour gets a new car or wins the lottery, many people vent their jealousy by finding someone to blame. In primitive societies, natural disasters and diseases are blamed on foreigners or a neighbouring tribe. Even today, the Egyptian press blames Israel and the Jews for AIDS and other calamities, including grinding poverty.

Gerald Steinberg in Jerusalem

The Jewish people have a great deal of experience with the scapegoat factor. To redirect this most undesirable human trait, the Jewish religion developed the literal concept of a scapegoat. In the Yom Kippur service, we still read about the ceremony that took place during the centuries when the Temple in Jerusalem was functioning, in which the High Priest cast lots and the goat that was selected by lot to symbolically carry the people's past year's sins was taken to the Judean desert to die.

Tragically, other cultures around the world have failed to adopt such substitution mechanisms, and take out their frustrations on minority groups. The Jewish people have often been selected to play the role of scapegoat, reaching the horrifying climax during the Nazi Holocaust. The racism and anti-Semitism that began in Austria, Germany and many other countries in Christian Europe were, in many respects, a manifestation of the scapegoat phenomenon.

Now, in the collective imaginations of many Arab and Muslim countries, the West, and, in many cases, Israel and the Jews are blamed for economic catastrophe, disease and overall failure. Rather than admitting that their own political malfunctions, including massive corruption, poor education, and other deficiencies are responsible for their distress, they look for and readily adopt scapegoats. If people in the western world live better, enjoy life more and are generally more successful, jealousy takes over and scapegoating begins. This factor, more than any inherent characteristic of Islam, is responsible for the mass hatred that is exploited by Osama bin Laden and other terrorists.

In addition to America, Israel also figures frequently in the search for scapegoats. Palestinians have long given preference to attacking and killing Israelis over building up their own country and replacing a corrupt ruling elite, headed by Yasser Arafat, with accountable leaders.

As noted above, many Egyptians, including some leading "intellectuals," are quick to blame Israel for every problem. A few years ago, when an Egyptair pilot committed suicide by taking a plane full of passengers (including a number of army officers) on a flight from New York to Cairo to their deaths, the Egyptian press and officials such as the redoubtable Amr Mousa (now head of the Arab League) proposed fanciful conspiracy theories blaming Israel and the Americans. The truth, which was obvious from the beginning, could never be accepted.

After the fundamentalist-led suicide terror attacks that killed thousands in New York and Washington, the scapegoat process is once again in full swing in the Arab and Islamic world. Many newspapers and even academics in these countries openly assert that since (in their warped view of the world) Israel will benefit by the global campaign on Islamic terrorism, these attacks must have been planned by the Jewish conspiracy. (According to this logic, it is the Palestinians, who danced in the streets and cheered these acts of inhuman brutality, who should be prime suspects.)

What is particularly disturbing is the readiness of prominent diplomats to pander to such nonsense. On his way to Iran, British Foreign Secretary Jack Straw declared that he understood Islamic anger at western support for Israel. Leaders of the European Union have declared that while the terrorist attacks against the United States are unacceptable, suicide bombings in Jerusalem are a reflection of "legitimate grievances." Instead of encouraging such outrages, the high priests of the UN should take one goat from each country, cast lots to determine who is to blame for the evils of the world, and sacrifice the chosen goat in a live broadcast on CNN and the BBC.

The Kirshner File

The Taliban regime: Osama bin Laden's patron

Osama bin Laden, the prime suspect accused of masterminding the Sept. 11 terrorist attacks in Manhattan and Washington, D.C., is believed by most observers to be holed up in the wilds of Afghanistan, the object of the biggest manhunt in recent history. The Taliban, the insular clique that controls much of that remote and impoverished nation, refuses to give him up to the United States, which is preparing to launch massive reprisal raids against bin Laden's Al Qaeda network.

Sheldon Kirshner in Toronto

What readers may not realize is that the Taliban, which governs Afghanistan in accordance with a grotesque and repelling interpretation of Islamic law, actually began as an Islamic reform movement.

Emerging from the wreckage of two costly wars, the Mujaheddin struggle against an invading Soviet army and the civil war that followed on its heels, the Taliban seemed no different from all the other Islamic factions vying for dominance in the mid-1990s.

Its declared aims – the restoration of peace, the disarmament of militias and the enforcement of Sharia law – were in keeping with the broad objectives of the ragtag band of bearded Afghani fighters who drove Soviet legions out of Afghanistan with the moral, political, financial and logistical support of the United States, Pakistan and Saudi Arabia.

Marching into Kabul, the capital, in September 1996, the shock troops of the Taliban were welcomed as liberators. But euphoria soon turned to disgust when the Taliban's leadership showed its true brutal colours. In its first official act after capturing Kabul, the Taliban castrated and killed Najibullah – the country's former president – and strung up his bloated corpse on a concrete traffic post.

Within 24 hours of this atrocity, the new regime unveiled the world's strictest Islamic regimen, making Iran's harsh theocratic system appear benign by contrast. Recognizing no Islam but its own perverted brand, it banned women from the work force – a draconian, self-defeating measure, considering the fact that schools, health clinics, hospitals and one-quarter of the civil service were run by women. Adding insult to injury, females were forced to wear burqas, head-to-toe veils.

That was just the beginning. In short order, television, videos, satellite dishes, music and all games, including football, chess and kite-flying, were banned, and men without beards were arrested. Afghanistan was thrown into the dark ages, its Taliban government recognized by only Pakistan, Saudi Arabia and the United Arab Emirates.

Last summer, the Taliban enacted further intolerant edicts, the likes of which had not been seen since the Nazi period. Two ancient statues of Buddha were destroyed and Hindus were instructed to wear identity labels on their clothing to distinguish them from Muslims.

If you have difficulty understanding the motives and actions of the Taliban, you're in good company, writes Ahmed Rashid in Taliban: Militant Islam, Oil and Fundamentalism in Central Asia (Yale University Press), a fine primer. A correspondent of the Far Eastern Economic Review and the Daily Telegraph who has covered Afghanistan for the past two decades, he explains that a cloak of secrecy conceals its political structures, its decision-making process and its leaders. It is the most enigmatic regime since the Khmer Rouge of Cambodia.

The question is whether it represents the new face of Islamic fundamentalism: aggressive, expansionist and uncompromising in its purist demand to convert Afghanistan into its imagined model of seventh century Arabian society.

This much seems certain: Present-day Afghanistan, administered by a one-eyed supreme leader named Mullah Mohammed Omar, is one of the world's most isolated nations. After Al Qaeda bombed the U.S. embassies in Kenya and Tanzania in August 1998, the United States demanded bin Laden's extradition. Rebuffing Washington, Afghanistan was placed under United Nations sanctions.

Landlocked and mountainous, Afghanistan lies on the crossroads between Central Asia and South Asia. It was through Afghanistan that traders plied the fabled Silk Route. The Macedonian Greeks under Alexander the Great conquered Afghanistan. Arab armies swept through Afghanistan, and the Persian Saminid dynasty pacified it. Genghis Khan and his Mongol hordes roared through it, and in the 16th century, Afghanistan reverted to Persian hegemony under the Safavid dynasty. During the 19th century, Britain and Russia jockeyed for influence in what historians called the Great Game. And now, at the dawn of a new millennium, Afghanistan lies in the crosshairs of American wrath.

Before the latest convulsions, regional states and Western companies were embroiled in a competitive race to build lucrative pipelines across Afghanistan to transport oil from the last untapped reserves in Turkmenistan.

As Rashid points out in this fascinating book, a melange of historical narrative and personal reportage, Islam has always been at the centre of the lives of ordinary Afghanis. Indeed, Islam has united Afghanistan's diverse, multi-ethnic population.

Traditionally, Afghan-style Islam has been tolerant toward other Muslim sects and different religions. Afghani mullahs were never known for trying to push Islam down people's throats, and until the early 1990s, Hindus, Sikhs and Jews played an integral role in Afghanistan's economy.

The post-1992 civil war destroyed this age-old tradition of tolerance, dividing Islamic sects and ethnic groups as never before. For the first time in Afghanistan's history, Islam became a divisive force, and Rashid blames the Taliban for this development.

Its acolytes, recruited from Islamic theology schools in Afghan refugee camps in Pakistan, were drawn from the majority Pashtuns, who account for 40 percent of Afghanistan's 20 million people.

Although they started out as Islamic reformers, Taliban leaders debased their philosophy, rigidity rejecting the concept of doubt as little more than heresy. In doing so, the Taliban created an austere and intimidating model of Islam at odds with Islam's message of peace and tolerance.

According to Rashid, the Taliban has whipped up a new form of Islamic fundamentalism across Pakistan and Central Asia that is resistant to compromise with traditional Islamic values, social structures and existing state systems.

He claims that the Taliban is poorly tutored in Islamic and Afghan history, knowledge of the Sharia and the Koran and 20th century political developments in the Muslim world. "This has created an obscurantism which allows no room for debate even with fellow Muslims," he observes.

The Taliban, he adds, showcases a new kind of Islamic extremism that rejects accommodation with Islamic moderation and the West.

Given the background of its elite, this is hardly surprising. The Taliban leadership springs from the poorest, most conservative and least literate southern Pashtun provinces. In Mullah Mohammed Omar's village, women were always veiled and girls were barred from school.

Taliban recruits, the lumpenproletariat from the civil war and the Pakistani refugee camps, were reared in madrassas, exclusively male milieus where control over women was a powerful symbol of manhood.

The Mujaheddin camps, which housed some 35,000 Muslim radicals from 43 countries from 1982 to 1992, were incubators of Islamic fundamentalism as well. These camps, supported by U.S. funds during the Soviet Union's occupation of Afghanistan from 1979 to 1989, became virtual universities for Islamic radicals. "None of the intelligence agencies involved wanted to consider the consequences of bringing together thousands of Islamic radicals from all over the world," Rashid comments acidly.

The disintegration of Afghanistan produced yet another disastrous effect: its notoriety as the world's largest largest cultivator of raw opium. The Mujaheddin used drug money to help finance the war against the Soviets and line their own pockets. The Taliban collected taxes from farmers growing opium, conveniently turning a blind eye to the Islamic prohibition against drugs. However, under an agreement with the United Nations, poppy planting was banned.

Rashid concludes that, while the Taliban is not as popular as it was five years ago, it still commands the allegiance of numerous Afghanis, and "cannot be wished away." This is the sober message we're left with in Taliban. But with the United States poised to strike Afghanistan, nothing may ever be the same again.

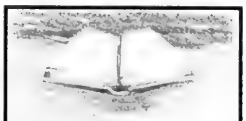
Shabbat Sukkot: The exalted guests

By RABBI LEIGH LERNER



Rabbinic Reflections

Why the great emphasis on guests at Sukkot?

In Leviticus 23:42, we are commanded to dwell in booths during the festival of Sukkot. It says, "You shall dwell in booths for seven days."

English does not reveal the depth of thought that Hebrew does, for the command is in the plural – you, plural, shall dwell in booths. Later, we receive an injunction to dwell in booths with family and with those others who dwell among us. From the earliest days of Israel's history, the festival of Sukkot included guests. The sukkah was a place not just for the lone individual, but for the many.

In our day, we may need to recapture the importance of the guest to Jewish living, and the teachings of Sukkot show the way.

The first guests to bring forth are our ancestors. Sukkot has the custom of ushpizin, of welcoming sacred, holy guests from the Jewish past into the sukkah. Tradition welcomes Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph, Moses, Aaron and David – one guest for each of the seven days that we are to dwell in booths. And why these seven guests? Tradition ascribes a certain quality to each; for example, Avraham is the quality of loving-kindness.

Thus, each day of Sukkot takes on its special significance among the highest values of Jewish living. In addition, each day takes on a mystical quality, for these various attributes were considered part of the levels of the godhead as described in the Kabbalah. They're not just ancient names to mention, then, but eternal Jewish attributes that we want to dwell in our midst, guests we'd like to stay for a lifetime.

We want to welcome other holy guests as well. Are there not seven women to correspond with the seven ancient leaders of Israel – Sarah, Rebecca, Rachel, Leah, Hannah, Ruth and Esther? And are there not seven leaders of our people in other days who also take on an aura of sanctity? Hillel, Shammai, Rabbis Akiva, Meir and Joshua, Rabban Gamliel and Rabbi Yehudah Hanasi, and many others, from Maimonides and Yehuda Halevi to Leo Baeck and Solomon Schechter.

Every home ought to consider special guests from Jewish history who dwell in spirit with us in the sukkah. Study and knowledge of our past will point to the names we want to add on Sukkot. With its history well into the origins of our people, Sukkot calls us to learn who were our predecessors in the sukkah, to be familiar with their work, and to bring it forth as an eternal reminder of Jewish living from year to year. With historic guests mentioned in our sukkah, we are noting the good harvest of a wide variety of thought in Jewish learning and lore.

The Torah also commands us to make a guest of the stranger in our gates, a custom for Shabbat and other holy days, too.

It is easy to welcome the seven sanctified guests of history to our table, for they take nothing away from what we have to eat. But if David or Moses were to arrive one night, would we not give them our very best? So the Sephardim, when providing a person with the needs of the festival, say, "This is the portion of the exalted guests." They want to give David's and Moses's share to someone who can enjoy it today. It's a good custom for Ashkenazim, too.

We can welcome sacred guests like Abraham and Sarah. We can welcome the stranger in our midst. And we can welcome a third guest, the festival itself. In too many homes we neglect to welcome the festival of Sukkot with candles and Kiddush, with a visit to a sukkah. In fact, the third guest is not the festival itself, but the Holy One, the God of Israel. When we bring the fragile sukkah into our lives, we recall the trust our ancestors had to show in God as they wandered in the wilderness.

Our lives, too, are fragile, for all our attempts to be strong and self-reliant. We, too, can learn a greater reliance on the Holy One of Israel. By making the festival of Sukkot a guest in our homes, we help to achieve that noble goal.

Wouk's sequel engaging

The Will to Live On by Herman Wouk, HarperCollins, 2000.

Books
Bernard Baskin

Forty years ago, Herman Wouk – now 84 – wrote This is My God, his guide to Judaism and personal statement of faith. Its unexpected success delighted both author and publisher. What surprised many readers was that Wouk – celebrated for such literary successes as The Caine Mutiny, which won the Pulitzer Prize in 1952, and for Marjorie Morningstar a bestseller in 1955 – was an observant Jew and a student of the Talmud.

Now, at 84, he has written a sequel to the earlier work, an account of the worldwide revolutionary changes that have swept over Jewry during the past four decades, set against a brief but helpful exploration of Jewish history, tradition, outstanding personalities and sacred literature.

Wouk is saddened by the decline in Jewish numbers, as well as loyalty and observance, in North America. "The Melting Pot is beginning to work on Jewry. Its effect was deferred in the passing century by the shock of the Holocaust and the rise of Israel, but today the Holocaust is an academic subject, and Israel is no longer a beleaguered underdog. Amkha in America is not dying, it is slowly melting, and those are very different fates. Dying is a terror, an agony, a strangling finish, to be fought off by sheer instinct, by the will to live on, to the last breath. Melting is a mere diffusion into an ambient welcoming warmth in which one is dissolved and disappears, as a teaspoon of sugar vanishes into hot tea."

The author's thinking about aspects of Judaism may have changed, but not, he insists, his firm belief in a supernatural God and His revealed Torah. He realizes, however, that for those not raised from the cradle to understand the commandments, the path of traditional observance is hard and unlikely.

Wouk's voice is warm and open to different points of view. He uses the term "Yiddishkeit" to include all affirmative Jews. "I know Reform Jews and humanist Jews too, who have worked all their lives to build Israel and to rescue Jews, sometimes laying their lives on the line. To assert that such Jews have no Yiddishkeit is unintelligible to me."

How to stop the steep decline in American Jewry? The author proposes a kind of Manhattan Project of education on a vast scale, into which money and planning would be invested as they once were in Israel during its years of peril.

The book, written in an easy, popular style, is enriched by anecdotes from a many-sided career. Visiting in 1955 with Ben-Gurion at his Sde Boker Kibbutz, Wouk is told that he should return to Israel to live.

"This is the only place for Jews like you. Here you will be free," Ben Gurion said.

"Free?" Wouk ventured to reply. "Free? With enemy armies ringing you, with their leaders publicly threatening to wipe out 'the Zionist entity,' with your roads impassable after sundown — free?"

"I did not say safe," the old man retorted, "I said free."

Wouk relates that some months after then U.S. president Harry Truman recognized Israel, the Chief Rabbi of Israel was invited to the White House. "God put you in your mother's womb," he told the president, "so you would be the instrument to bring the rebirth of Israel after two thousand years." It is recorded that Truman wept.

All in all, this is an engaging encounter with a genial, Jewishly concerned octogenarian who speaks from the heart about his beloved faith.

The final three days of Sukkot

By MARK MIETKIEWICZ

On the final days of Sukkot, we celebrate three days with their own, unique traditions. While Hoshanah Rabah, Shemini Atzeret and Simchat Torah don't enjoy the popularity on the Web as other holidays, some sites are well worth the visit.

Sunday night is the start of the seventh day of Sukkot, called Hoshanah Rabah because on that day the word Hoshanah ("please save") is recited frequently [http://207.168.91.4/vjholidays/sukkot/simchat.htm]. For a very interesting article on how the word Hoshanah found its way into the English language, see Eliezer Siegel's "Hosanna" [http://www.ucalgary.ca/~elsegal/Shokel/930929_Hosanna.html].

Although Hoshanah Rabah is considered a special day, it does not share the same work prohibitions as other Jewish holidays. You can watch an online video of the late Rabbi Shlomo Carlebach as he conducted a two-hour Hoshanah Rabah service at New York City's Congregation Kehilath Jacob [http://www.613.org/video.html].

One of the central traditions of the day is the striking of the floor with five willow branches. Though some say the reason for this tradition is mystical, that hasn't stopped Ohr Somayach from giving us a Top Ten List of the WRONG Reasons for Hitting Hoshanas on the Floor [http://www.ohrorg.il/judaism/humor/top10/hoshana.htm].

From there, we move on to Shemini Atzeret/Simchat Torah, celebrated for one day in Israel and by Reform Jews and for two days by others. Considered a separate holiday from Sukkot, it marks the annual completion of the reading of the Torah and the celebration of its start with the story of Bereshit [http://www.torah.org/learning/yomtov/sukkos/].

Surely one of the holiday's highlights for any child is dancing around the Torah while waving a flag. If you want to make your own flag, you'll find instructions at the UAHC Jewish Parent Page [http://uahc.org/education/parent/0303.html] while learn@JTS Kid's Corner lets you print out and dress up your own Torah [http://learn.jtsa.edu/topics/kids/together/simchattorah/].

Of course, the holiday is best known as the time of endings and beginnings. According to "Succoth and the Festival Cycle," Shemini Atzeret/Simchat Torah is unique because it represents two climaxes in the Jewish calendar. It comes at the end of the holiday season which begins in the month of Elul and continues through Rosh Hashanah, Yom Kippur and Sukkot. And it also marks the end of the harvest season which began with Passover in the spring and continued through Shavuot [http://www.innernet.org.il/archives/succot.htm].

Just as Simchat Torah is a time of renewal for the Torah, it can also mark a time of rediscovery. On a chance visit to the Bobover Chasidic community of Boro Park on Simchat Torah, Norman Salsitz was brought back to memories of a heroic deed done a world away. During the war, Salsitz disguised his Jewish identity and was able to become a Polish state security officer known as Tadeusz Zaleski. Through his secret actions, "Zaleski" saved the lives of two Jewish boys. But his heroism was never acknowledged until he entered that synagogue on that fateful Simchat Torah [http://www.jewishworldreview.com/0798/zaleski1.asp].

After the holiday, you're left to take down your sukkah while trying to remember just how it fit into your garage last year. If it won't last one more year, you may wonder how to dispose of it. According to Ohr Somayach's Ask the Rabbi, holy items such as Torah scrolls, Tefillin and Mezuzot should be buried, while old sukkah wood should be burned or placed in your fireplace for a Shabbat fire [http://www.ohr.edu/ask/ask100.htm#Q1]. The Web site points out that it is disrespectful to merely throw items of holiness in the garbage and concludes with a personal anecdote that could only happen in Israel:

"I was once walking to yeshiva when I passed a garbage truck moving slowly down the street. The garbage man standing in back of the truck was trying to get my attention. Then I noticed he was holding something long and black in his outstretched arm, and he was motioning for me to take it. 'Burnt spaghetti?' I wondered. I reached out and took it. It was a tfillin strap. 'This shouldn't be in the garbage,' said the garbage man. 'You'll know what to do with it.'"

Chag samayach.

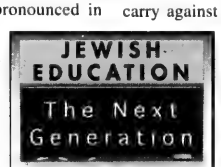
A time of blackness

By ELLIOTT MALAMET

I keep staring at the page, trying to turn thoughts into words into narrative, the time-honoured craft of building sentences. But instead I think of a world tumbling, and of the millions of words that have been instantly printed and pronounced in the wake of the West's fallen towers. It is hard to breathe for all of those words that have emerged, phoenix-like, filling every crack and trace of the stunned quest to bring lucidity and order to a world scorched dry of meaning.



There is a cruelly relentless return to mundane normalcy in the school halls these days. I overhear adolescent boys prattle on about their football heroes and I listen to the clang of lockers lined with pictures of movie stars and leftover camp memories. After all, how long can you feel numb, right? – numb is a drag, sir – and so I sense that I lag far behind the relentless urge of others to once again reunite with the great continental march to distraction.

I push away the Bible Belt literalness that beckons from the Torah portion I had been studying: "God will carry against you a nation from afar, from the end of the earth as an eagle shall swoop, a nation whose language you shall not understand... It will beseige you in all of your cities, until the collapse of your high and fortified walls in which you trusted..." (Deuteronomy 28: 49, 52).

People love to quantify what they cannot begin to fathom, and I will not use a sacred text in the manner of some barebacked beach bum snooping through the sand with his divining rod to pick up golden traces of biblical prophecy. Religion isn't some simple game of "I told you so."

I listen to my youngest child as she lies sleeping, her breathing slow and deliberate and blissfully free from the Joycean babble that fills my unrestful mind – Taliban boxcutters shoulder to shoulder firefighters revenge smoke Islam smoke CNN smoke flying schools Pentagon smoke firefighters heroes walls of photographs enemies allies jumpers from the very top –

And then I suddenly remember a snatch of a Rilke poem that I have always loved: "We are all falling. This hand's falling too/ all have this falling sickness none withstands/ And yet there's always One whose gentle hands/this universal falling can't fall through."

And I hope that this is true, that the aspirations that we have for the future of our children will rise beyond the acid skies and reach to the throne of mercy. Because someone and someone seem to have slipped through those fingers this time, or is this too something I am unable to see for all of the blackness in my heart? I reach for my daughter's hand and hold it for a long time in the darkness, waiting for the first light to come.

Opinion

Out of evil, good

By SHIRA HONIG
CJN Staff

I've always loved New Yorkers. Maybe that's because my parents met and fell in love in Manhattan. Maybe it's because, as the daughter of a woman from Chicago – herself the daughter of a woman from Chicago – I'm half American. Maybe it's because their passion, their directness, their chutzpah – their very character, so similar to Israelis' – can be as endearing as it can be frustrating.

Over the past few weeks, my love for them has increased tenfold. We all have images in our minds from Sept. 11 that will remain with us forever. Some of the sights and sounds that will stay with me, aside from images of hundreds of people holding up pictures of loved ones in their desperate search for them, are from Mayor Rudolph Giuliani's press conference on the night of the attacks: fire commissioner Thomas Von Essen's shaky voice as he announced that he – and the department – had lost many of its best people; the mayor's graceful, stoic manner as he patiently answered questions and reassured his constituents as a father might reassure his children, even going so far as to warn service providers in the city not to gouge customers because now definitely wasn't the time. And still others: New York cabbies ripping out their back seats to make room for victims and rushing them to hospital; New York Governor George Pataki's thank you to a firefighter at a hospital visit, to which the firefighter immediately replied: "What do you expect? I'm a New Yorker."

I'll never forget that firefighter's accent as long as I live.

In the midst of the evil responsible for the atrocities committed on American soil that day, such character inspires. We can learn a lot from these heroic, resilient New Yorkers, who have absolutely refused to allow their spirit to be broken by this assault on their freedom. We can learn a lot from them, just as we can from the Israelis who have been equally heroic for years, dusting themselves off and moving on after each attack.

One of the lessons I'm learning is that adopting a self-righteous, "we-told-you-so" attitude about terrorism is not only harmful but pointless. It won't solve the problem. The only thing that will solve the problem, little by little, is to counter such evil with good. Commit a good deed, and see where it takes you and the people around you. Just like evil acts, acts of goodness have a domino effect.

Up until recently, I envied the generation who'd grown up in the '60s amidst all those rallies and protests, amidst all that purpose. My – our – generation has been, in a way, aimless, spoiled, looking for causes and finding them briefly – some might say fallaciously – in the protests against the World Trade Organization's summits in Seattle and Quebec City.

Now, my envy is different: I wish things were today the way they were 35 years ago. But of course they're not, and that is both a curse and a blessing. A curse, because the bar has been raised; we live in a far more dangerous, uncertain world than the one that existed just days ago. A blessing, because we now have a real opportunity – as both a Jewish community and as part of the world community – to pull together like these New Yorkers and make a difference. This is not to say that other causes, such as environmentalism or the struggle against poverty and slave labour, are unimportant. But today there is a new urgency to act.

U.S. President George W. Bush addressed Americans, and the world, in his speech to a joint session of Congress, saying, "Our nation, this generation, will lift the dark threat of violence from our people and our future. We will rally the world to this cause by our efforts, by our courage. We will not tire, we will not falter and we will not fail."

In a no-less stirring Rosh Hashanah sermon, a rabbi addressed his congregation, saying, "Whether we understand it or not, it's very simple. Our prayers have a greater direct impact on events of this world than the decisions of presidents or terrorists."

Despite the undoubtedly long fight ahead, despite the death toll, despite the difficulties in pinpointing and defeating the twisted spirit of suicide bombers around the world, despite the oft-times scant media and public support for Israel – despite all the odds – let us, individually and collectively, keep up our courage through prayer and maintain a spirit of character through good deeds. If we play dominoes, we can make this world a better place, and we will not fail.

Two Torahs dedicated for Chabad@Flamingo

By LEILA SPEISMAN
Staff Reporter

TORONTO — A suburban strip mall is not the kind of place one expects to find a religious celebration. But that is exactly what took place at Vaughan's Rosedale Heights Plaza last week, when two Torahs were dedicated for Chabad@Flamingo synagogue.

Over 200 men, women and children milled around under a tent, danced in exuberant circles to the music of Nafshenu Orchestra, Israeli singer Kolbi Chai and cantor Paul Kowarsky. Later, they formed a procession up Bathurst Street to the synagogue, escorted by York Region police and a few cheerful Jewish bikers.

The Torahs were dedicated by the Crone and Stivelman families in memory of family members who perished in the Holocaust.

The final word in each Torah was filled in by Chabad@Flamingo spiritual leader Rabbi Mendel Kaplan. The priestly blessing was read from each Torah, the Crone torah by Rabbi Dovid Schochet, president of the Toronto Vaad Harabanim and the Stivelman torah by Rabbi Zalman Grossbaum, executive director, Chabad Lubavitch of Ontario.

An emotional David Crone told the audience that he and his family are proud of their ancestors, "traditional Jews who carried on a quiet, peaceful life in Poland and Scotland, and followed Yiddish customs and traditions."

He urged the audience to be good Jews. "Be proud of your heritage, do mitzvahs, learn Torah and feel good about being Jewish." But he warned them not to be complacent. "We must never let go, we must never forget, we must strive forward for our Jewish future and for our children."

Michael Stivelman, father of synagogue member Ed Stivelman, came from Rio de Janeiro for the occasion. Speaking, he said, for "the six million who aren't here to celebrate with us," he talked about the great responsibility carried by all Jews.

"Throughout the ages, despite all of the misfortunes that have befallen us, we have managed to carry out our duties gracefully.

"Justice, sympathy, concern for the destitute and respect for tradition have been just some of our outstanding attributes."

At his request, at the end of the program, Rabbi Kaplan recited a Psalm, and then Kaddish, in memory of martyrs of the Holocaust and of those killed by the recent terrorist attacks in the United States.

Councillor Susan Kadis brought greetings from the city of Vaughan.

The Torahs were carried, as is the tradition, under a chupah, accompanied by a flatbed truck carrying the musicians, as well as enthusiastic singing and dancing, which continued in the shul.
